"WHY ARE YOU SAVING?"

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, it may be a bit old fashioned, but shortly after graduation from college I embarked upon a program which I thought would provide for my security in later years. I used, as a basis for my program, insurance, for with four children it was imperative that there be adequate protection for my wife and children.

With each new spin in the inflationary spiral I have been forced to reassess my program from time to time and adjust it upward, for what I planned to have set aside in retirement benefits dollarwise will not give me at some future date what I thought I would have 10 years ago. It follows that if we experience the same degree of inflation in the next 10 years I will have to go still further by way of adjusting my program upward, and I am wondering if the end is ever in sight or whether I will ever be able to catch up.

In the Chicago Tribune Sunday edition of April 19 there appeared a front page editorial, which I should like to have reprinted at this point in the RECORD, entitled, "Why Are You Saving?" The tone of the editorial struck a responsive chord with me and I recommend it as good reading for every American.

WHY ARE YOU SAVING?

Are you saving for your old age?

Why, for heaven's sake?

It may seem a silly question. If you are going to quit work, you certainly have to have something put by against the day that the paychecks stop. What else can you do if you want to retire?

You can't do anything, of course. You are in the same fix as the man who was warned that the roulette wheel he was playing was crooked. He knew it, but it was the only roulette wheel in town.

Anybody who saves today for some future period is putting his dollars on the crooked roulette wheel of inflation. The people to whom he intrusts his money—insurance company, stockbroker, pension trustee, the Social Security Administrator—aren't the crooked croupiers. They are honest. Every dollar you give them you will get back, with interest.

It isn't until you start to spend the money you saved that you find the wheel was crooked. If we take the experience of the last 20 years as a guide, the dollar you put away today will be worth less than 50 cents, at today's prices, when you spend it 20 years from now.

Suppose you put a dollar away 20 years ago, in 1939. Applied to your living expenses today it would buy only 48 cents as much as it would have when you saved it.

That is the ground on which inflation hurts us all. We may think that a little inflation is something nice—so long as we keep working. We like to see our pay go up. If we buy stocks, we like to see them go up.

If we are farmers, we like the Government to support prices—buy our crops at far higher prices than they command in a free market. If we are businessmen, we like the orders that come from foreign aid and the vast military spending.

In short, we all like the effects of inflation—which all of these practices cause—even if we do think that inflation itself is a nasty word.

But sooner or later ninety-nine out of a hundred of us are caught in the same box. We want to retire. Whatever provision we have made for retirement, we are going to find that continuing inflation slashes the value—the purchasing power—of what we have saved. We have about half as much to live on as we thought we would have when we put the money away.

So we buy equities—common stocks that increase in price as the dollar slips in value. People are buying equities like mad. They have boosted their prices to the point where they yield, at the current market, 3.3 percent a year. Government bonds yield around 4 percent. Insurance against inflation—against being paid off in dollars—costs you a fifth of earnings on your investment, beyond which you also assume the risk that the stock may not earn a dividend some year.

There is just one way out of the box, one way to insure that the money you put away for old age will support you when you retire. That is to stop inflation.

UNION BACKING AT THE POLLS

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, an article by Congressional Quarterly which appeared in the Detroit Free Press on April 14, 1959, casts some rather revealing looks at union funds and their uses during the last general election. There is little argument with the fact that the amounts listed by unions do not truly reflect the total amount of union participation in the last election. But they give those of us in Congress an indication of what is happening in our campaigns. It is going to be interesting to note the way that these Members of Congress vote on matters affecting labor unions and the positions of these unions on various national issues.

WHAT LABOR SPENT IN 1958 ELECTIONS—WHO THE UNIONS BACKED AT POLLS WITH DOLLARS

WASHINGTON.—When a Democrat needs money for a campaign these days, he is likely to find labor unions in a better position to help him than his own party committees.

That seems to have been the case in 1958, at least.

A Congressional Quarterly survey, completed Monday, shows labor unions spent more money on the last election than the Democratic National Committee and its adjuncts in the House and Senate campaign.

The survey, which may throw some light on the continuing controversy over labor's influence in politics, shows that union funds reached at least 233 candidates for Congress in 46 of the 49 States in 1958. Of these candidates, 152 were elected.

The only States that did not find a place on labor's list were Arkansas, New Hampshire, and South Carolina.

Indications are that Republicans received the benefit of only 1 or 2 percent of the money laid out by the unions.

Unions cannot legally spend any money from their treasuries in connection with Federal elections. They are barred from using members' dues for partisan purposes, just as corporations are denied the right to tap their stockholders' equity to make political contributions.

But the unions can and do ask their members to contribute money voluntarily to political funds. These voluntary dollars make up labor's campaign war chest, from which the needs of friendly candidates are supplied.

How important the labor war chest has become is indicated by a few comparisons.

Thirty-two of organized labor's political committees reported spending a total of $1,828,777 on the 1958 campaign.

That was relatively small potatoes compared to the $4,657,652 campaign outlay reported by 14 Republican committees.

But it exceeded the $1,702,605 spending by seven Democratic committees on the 1958 campaign. The combined Democratic-labor total fell about $1.2 million short of reported GOP outlays.

Actually, of course, Republican, Democratic, and labor figures are all misleadingly small. The only political committees that have to report to the House are those that operate in more than one State.

Political groups whose activities are limited to a single State, city, or district do not have to report, although some do so voluntarily. Thus, accurate figures on all campaign spending—National, State, and local—are impossible to obtain.

But the figures reported by the big multistate committees indicate pretty clearly that in 1958, for the first time, organized labor plunked more money into the Democratic campaign kitty than the national Democratic committees themselves did.

Total spending of the Democratic, national, senatorial, congressional committees was $1,340,636.

The big five of organized labor alone spent a nearly equal amount—$1,333,181.

The AFL–CIO Committee on Political Education reported expenditures of $709,813.

Walter P. Reuther's UAW reported money in three separate political accounts, but the net expenditures were computed at $243,790.

David J. McDonald's United Steelworkers said it spent $192,136 on politics.

David Dubinsky's International Ladies' Garment Workers Union chipped in $107-716.

And the Machinists, headed by Albert J. Hayes, spent $79,726.

The 27 other labor committees that reported in Washington chipped in lesser amounts to bring the total up to $1,828,777.

Two of the best-known unions—the Teamsters and the United Mine Workers—did not file political spending reports at all. Spokesmen told Congressional Quarterly their contributions were made at the State and local level, where they do not have to be reported in Washington.

The men who handle labor's big political money are shrewd investors.

In 1958 they put the biggest stakes on 10 Democratic senatorial hopefuls and saw all but one of them come through to victory.

The lone disappointment was former Gov. George M. Leader, Democrat, who had $16,000 of union members' money riding with him in his unsuccessful Pennsylvania Senate race.

The biggest supplies of cash were earmarked for Leader and these other Democrats:

1. Senator WILLIAM PROXMIRE, Wisconsin, $25,625.

2. Senator CLAIR ENGLE, California, $24,-950.

3. Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, New Jersey, $20,900.

4. Senator THOMAS J. DODD, Connecticut, $19,400.

5 and 6. Senators ROBERT C. BYRD and JENNINGS RANDOLPH, $19,000 each for the twin races in West Virginia.

7. Senator ERNEST GRUENING, Alaska, $16,750.

8. Senator PHILIP A. HART, Michigan, $16,600.

9. Senator GALE MCGEE, Wyoming, $15,500.

The analysis indicates clearly that labor's political braintrusting is willing to gamble heavily with the membership's voluntary dollars when they think a long-shot has a chance to win.

PROXMIRE was the only holdover Senator on the list of the top 10 recipients of union support, and his race was regarded as the toughest any Democratic incumbent faced.

The other nine all had strenuous contests against substantial opponents. Yet, all but Leader won. Seven of the winners took over Republican seats.

At the same time, it appears that the union men did not waste much money currying favor with Democrats who were assured of victory.

Where Gruening was given $16,750 for his nip-and-tuck race against Republican Mike Stepovich in Alaska, no money at all was reported earmarked for his colleague and running-mate Senator E. L. (BOB) BARTLETT (Democrat, Alaska), who stands equally high in labor's estimation. The reason: BARTLETT had only token opposition.

A check for $2,500 from the COPE to aid the campaign of Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, Democrat, Massachusetts, was canceled when Massachusetts labor leaders informed national headquarters KENNEDY "didn't need the money."

Despite this hardheaded attitude, union leaders found reason to earmark some funds for all but 6 of the 36 Democratic candidates for the Senate in 1958.

Those who apparently did not share in the largesse were: Bartlett; Raymond G. Vendsel, the Democratic nominee in North Dakota; and four Southerners, Senators Spessard L. Holland, Florida, John C. Stennis, Mississippi, B. Everett Jordan, North Carolina, and Harry Flood Byrd, Virginia.

Republicans, on the other hand, found it very hard to pry open labor's pocketbook. Only $13,850 of union's reported total spending of $1,828,777 was earmarked for Republican candidates.

Senator WILLIAM LANGER, Republican, North Dakota, who votes more often with the Democrats than with his own party, was down for a total of $7,000 from COPE and the Steelworkers.

The Steelworkers earmarked $1,000 for ex-California Republican Gov. Goodwin J. Knight but reported contributing twice that much to Democratic Senator CLAIR ENGLE, who defeated him in the Senate race.

In House races, three contributions to Republicans were listed by the unions:

1. Representative JOHN B. BENNETT, Michigan, $3,000 from Railway Labor's Political League.

2. Representative GORDON CANFIELD, New Jersey, $750 from the Steelworkers and $500 from the International Ladies' Garment Worker's Union.

3. Representative THOMAS M. PELLY, Washington, $450 from Railway Labor's Political League.

4. Representative THOR C. TOLLEFSON, Washington, $400 from the National Maritime Union.

5. Ex-Representative Albert P. Morano, Connecticut, $250 from the Machinists.

6. Grover Cantrell, a union official who ran unsuccessfully against Representative BRUCE ALGER (Republican, Texas) in the primary, $500 from the Communications Workers.

UNIONS PUT UP $16,600 FOR HART

WASHINGTON.—Organized labor earmarked $50,141 for the 1958 election in Michigan, Congressional Quarterly reported Saturday.

The figure was disclosed by a careful search through the official reports of 32 labor political committees filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Reports were filed by most of the politically active labor internationals, but their State and local affiliates are not required to file in Washington and only a few did so voluntarily.

Of the $50,141 reported spent in Michigan on the 1958 campaign, $24,170 went to Democratic candidates and committees and $3,000 to Republicans.

The remaining $22,971 was sent to local labor committees and others to be spent by them.

Individual candidates identified in the Labor Committee reports and the sums reported sent to each were:

Senate—PHILIP A. HART (Democrat), House—Thaddeus M. Machrowicz, $750; Robert G. Hall, $250; Don Hayworth, $1,750; James G. O'Hara, $1,500; Charles C. Diggs, Jr., $250; Louis C. Rabaut, $250; John D. Dingell, $250; John Lesinski, $500; Martha W. Griffiths, $1,000; Leslie H. Hudson, $740, all Democrats, and John B. Bennett, $3,000, a Republican.

Only Hudson, Hayworth, and Hall failed to win their elections.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, as so many others have done throughout the world, I want to express my admiration for the great work that has been done by Mr. John Foster Dulles. At the same time it is certainly my present wish and prayer that he may speedily recover from his affliction. Also that he may soon be able to take again a more active part in the affairs of our Government and in the efforts to preserve an honorable international peace. Through the years that I have known him, my own admiration for Mr. Dulles has steadily increased. I have observed the training, experience, and dedication which he has brought to his Office as Secretary of State of the United States. Certainly all Americans know that no task was ever too arduous, no journey too long, no conferences too difficult for Mr. Dulles to undertake. He had a calm, logical type of mind—one in which his legal training and background was frequently apparent. When answering questions or making decisions, he was prone to deliberate briefly, obviously turning over all considerations in his mind before stating the conclusions that he reached. By doing this he avoided the situation in which public figures too often find themselves. That is, where conclusions are uttered in haste and later have to be retracted or modified. He was a realist in international affairs. In seeking to solve problems which confronted him, he would take into account all the factors that would play a part in the decision. In this connection he also understood the influences and the considerations which were in the minds of the foreign statesmen with whom he was dealing. Because of this ability on his part, the negotiations in which he participated very frequently reached more fruitful conclusions.

But I think of all the characteristics he had, the one which I respect the most was his courage and his willingness "to stand up and be counted." This was particularly apparent in his dealings with the Communists. He knew that it was of no use to give in to their demands and when he was sure he was right, he stood his ground. This perhaps more than any other one thing that he did while he was Secretary of State helped to preserve peace in the world. Here was a man representing a country that desired not a foot of land belonging to any other nation, but a man dedicated to the preservation of the rights of men and the protection of the freedoms of nations. This courage and willingness to take a stand was sometimes called inflexibility, but I think it was not so much that as it was the understanding that one who represented this Nation of ours must be willing to take positions which would be for the best interest of our country and at the same time, of course, for the best interest of free men everywhere.

Through the years that he has been Secretary of State, he has been a tower of strength for the entire free world. We are grateful for what he has done and I repeat, we sincerely hope that his health may improve and that he may have a long time in which to enjoy the rest and relaxation he has so richly earned.

PRESERVING GETTYSBURG BATTLEFIELD AS SACRED NATIONAL SHRINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUIGLEY] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker, last Monday evening I had occasion to speak to the Rotary Club of Gettysburg, Pa., and through it to deliver a message to the entire Gettysburg community.

At this time I would like to share that message with the Members of Congress and through them to deliver it to the larger nationwide audience which, I believe, the subject under discussion deserves. That subject is the preservation of the Gettysburg battlefield as a sacred national shrine.

On March 24, the House of Representatives considered and passed the 1960 appropriation for the Department of the Interior. During the debate on that measure I noted with regret that the Appropriations Committee had seen fit to delete from the bill the request of the National Park Service for money to be used for the acquisition of additional Civil War battlefield lands. My particular concern in this regard arose from the fact that a considerable portion of the money was earmarked for the purchase of some 600 additional acres within and adjoining the present battlefield area at Gettysburg.

I would like at this time to highlight the basis for my concern, to point up the problem which faces Gettysburg and the Congress, and why I think it is an important problem and, finally, I would like to suggest what I believe to be a workable solution.

The problem facing Gettysburg is this: The Federal Government presently owns some 2,800 acres of the soil on which the historic battle was fought. From the beginning the basic objective of the Congress in authorizing the acquisition of this land was to preserve it as it was when the battle took place. To a considerable extent this objective has been achieved. However, this success is explained only in part by the efforts and the acquisitions by the Federal Government. The very nature of the land involved has had much to do with the results achieved. A substantial portion of the battle was waged over what was then pretty good farmland. It still is. And for this reason, rather than because of anything the Federal Government might have done, it is not surprising that much of this soil is still being tilled as it was 96 years ago. Other parts of the battle involved impossibly rocky terrain not fit for agricultural or, for that matter, any other use. The passage of time has not made these rocky ways any more usable and so they have remained pretty much intact and undisturbed since those 3 days in July of 1863.

However, as anyone who even approaches Gettysburg can testify, the objective of preserving the battlefield area has been something less than a complete success. This is true for a variety of reasons; some valid, some not. Certainly No. 1 among the valid reasons is the inevitability of growth. When history met at its crossroads Gettysburg was a pretty small town with a population of not too much in excess of 2,000. Without, I trust, offending local pride I think it must be said that Gettysburg is still a small town. But in 1959 it is some four times larger than it was in 1863. This growth could not and did not take place without in some way disturbing the battlefield.

Almost from the day the guns went silent, certainly since the day when Lincoln spoke his immortal words, Gettysburg has been an American tourist mecca. At first the growth in tourism was relatively slow and confined to relatives of those who had fought here, and to students of the battle. However, with the advent of the automobile Gettysburg became accessible to every American with an urge to travel. The result has been that tourism is and has been the town's biggest industry for many years. Some three-quarters of a million people now visit Gettysburg annually. Most of these visitors have to be fed. A considerable number of them have to be housed. If Gettysburg failed to meet these needs it would rightly be criticized. Yet these needs cannot be met adequately and well without a certain amount of commercialism happening. This commercialism has, of course, caused the appearance of the town and the area to change from the way it was back in 1863.

Unfortunately the adverse results of the inevitable growth and necessary commercialization have been greater than it should have been because it has been allowed to happen without planning or an overall sense of direction. Despite this, much of the growth has been highly desirable. Unfortunately, in some instances much was left to be desired and in at least a few cases what has happened could only be deplored. Under these circumstances the only thing that the Federal Government could do to carry out its original purpose of preserving the battlefield area was to acquire more and more land.

However, there are some pretty obvious drawbacks to this land acquisition approach. In the first place, from the point of view of the Federal Government it is frightfully expensive and gets more so every year. In the second place, it is only partially effective. It is just not possible even for the Federal Government to buy up every last foot of ground on which every soldier set foot, in or on his way to and from the battle. Yet, at the very point where the Government stops buying there is nothing to prevent the erection of the most desecrating honky-tonk joints imaginable.

Nor do all the disadvantages of the land acquisition program run in the direction of the Federal Government. It is true that every time the Park Service acquires additional land it takes money out of the Federal Treasury but it also—indirectly—takes money out of the coffers of the local governments as well. This is so because the moment Uncle Sam takes title to the land it becomes tax exempt, and thereafter the local taxing authorities are denied forever the revenue which had come from that land as long as it was privately owned.

This tax-exempt status has created quite a problem in Adams County and especially so in Cumberland Township. The great bulk of the battlefield lies in Cumberland Township and just about all of the 2,762 acres which the Federal Government now owns, as well as the 600 additional acres it proposes to acquire, lies within this township. Needless to say, the Federal land acquisition program has a tremendous impact on local governmental units like Cumberland Township which is struggling to meet the evergrowing demands for better schools and better roads and all the other services the people are now demanding.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, one might very well ask two pointed questions. First, if the National Park's land acquisition program has such obvious drawbacks for both the Federal and local governments, was not the House of Representatives, by its vote on March 24, right in calling a halt to it? Secondly, if I am so aware of these defects why did I bother to raise my lonesome voice of protest against the House action?

Depite the shortcomings and defects in the program I believe the House was wrong in rejecting it and I will tell you why.

In my judgment the House acted as it did for three reasons. First, there was the general acceptance of the idea that the Federal Government already had enough land at Gettysburg. Second, there was a feeling that you never could buy enough battlefield lands to satisfy the cravings of the Civil War enthusiasts. Third, and the most important reason, was the balanced budget psychosis which is currently haunting the Congress of the United States.

If I am any judge of why the House voted as it did, I am convinced that many of the Members said to themselves, "All right, if the President is really serious about this balanced budget, let us show him that, like charity, balanced budgets begin at home. What better way can we strike a telling blow for economy in Government than by publicly slashing from the President's budget more than a million dollars, most of which was earmarked for spending right in the President's backyard." This, in my judgment, is why the House acted as it did.

I, too, am interested in a balanced budget but I cannot agree that the approach of the House in this instance is the sound way to reach a worthwhile goal.

As to the other arguments, while I am willing to concede that not even Uncle Sam would be rich enough to buy all the land at all the battlefields which many of the Civil War enthusiasts want, I very strongly disagree with those who contend that the Federal Government already has enough land at Gettysburg.

In the first place, Gettysburg just is not any battlefield of any war. It is not even just any battlefield of the Civil War. Gettysburg is Gettysburg: the site of one of the truly decisive battles in the whole of history. At Gettysburg the future of this country came to the crossroads. Here brave men fought and died not only that this Nation might live but to resolve how it would live.

In the second place, the Federal Government does not yet have enough property at Gettysburg because only by means of Federal acquisition can certain unfortunate errors of the past be deleted and their desecrating presence be removed from this hallowed ground. This is why, in my judgment, the action of the House was in error and this is why I trust the Senate will act otherwise.

But even if the Senate and ultimately the whole Congress and the President provide the money to acquire these additional lands, the problem is not solved. At Gettysburg it is not only necessary to correct past errors, it is essential that future ones be avoided.

To this latter end I have a very positive answer: Zoning.

I am happy to report that I have already discussed this idea of zoning with representatives of Cumberland Township and the National Park Service. I am even happier to be able to report that in each instance the suggestion was met with a most favorable reaction.

Here is exactly what I would like to see happen. And I told this to the Gettysburg community. I would hope that with a minimum of delay the supervisors of Cumberland Township would enact into law an ordinance which provides for zoning of the battlefield area and territory adjacent thereto which has been approved by the National Park Service.

In return for this effort at the local level—and I am sufficiently close to the political scene to be fully aware that the enactment of an effective zoning law can require a tremendous effort and sometimes even real courage—I would propose the following quid pro quo from the Federal Government. Henceforth, the National Park Service would agree to share with Cumberland Township, with the Cumberland Township School District and with Adams County, the three local taxing authorities, a portion of the rents collected from the leasing of federally owned land within the battlefield area.

This plan would operate roughly as follows: At the present time if the National Park Service acquires a farm which is valued at, say, $50,000, the owner is paid full value for his property. Before he sold to the Federal Government that owner was paying local taxes in the amount, let us assume, of $250 annually. After the sale, as I have already noted, no local taxes are paid. And this is true despite the fact that very often the Park Service will lease back the farm to the former owner or lease it to a new tenant who agrees to operate the farm under conditions specified by the Park Service.

Let us suppose that in our illustrated situation the former owner continues to operate the farm under a lease which requires him to pay the Federal Government an annual rental of $1,000. Thus we end up with this situation. On the one hand the former owner has $50,000 in the bank and he is still operating the farm. On the other hand the Federal Government has title to the land plus the assurance that the property will at no time in the future be used for any unauthorized purpose and in addition $1,000 goes into the Federal Treasury each year the property is rented. In sharp contrast to the former owner-present operator and Uncle Sam, the poor local taxing authorities—the township, the school district, and the county—end up with nothing.

Under my scheme the annual rental on the farm would be increased by $250—the amount formerly paid in local taxes—and this additional sum which the Federal Government collects would be turned over to the local government units to be divided among them on the same ratio as they share in the total of all other local taxes collected.

Such a proposal would certainly help the local governments involved. It would mean no loss of revenue to the Federal Government because it would still receive the same amount of rent it collected formerly. Not only would it not cost the Federal Government money, it would save it substantial amounts because with that zoning ordinance on the books the need for purchasing additional lands would be greatly reduced.

The increased cost involved would fall upon the National Park Service's tenants. Now I recognize that it might be somewhat impolitic for me to suggest that the additional burden be placed on some of my constituents but I dare to do it because we are faced with a problem which cries for a solution; and also because I have every reason to believe that in the past the Park Service has tended to charge rentals which were most reasonable. Even with the increased rental which I am suggesting most of the farms would still be real bargains and in great demand.

Now I recognize that making this plan a reality is going to take a lot of doing. There's bound to be opposition to any zoning proposal. There always is. My rental sharing plan would require the cooperation of three local governments and at least two different departments of the Federal Government and getting such cooperation can be no mean assignment. In addition, it is my judgment that such a rental sharing plan could only be put into operation with the approval of Congress. I trust you will understand if I am a little hesitant to predict what the Congress might do.

But I think that the kind of doing it will take is well worth the effort because failure to find a workable solution means the ultimate desecration of the Gettysburg battlefield as a sacred national shrine. In this effort I call upon the Gettysburg community for your help.

Certainly it was not necessary for me to point out to them, the business and professional leaders of the community, that in Gettysburg they are blessed with something unique. Its very presence, however, presents certain very real problems. Failure to face up to these problems in the past has caused them to get worse. Unless they are faced soon it may be too late. The goose may gouge itself to death and with its passing go all the golden eggs.

Mr. Speaker, it is fashionable to criticize people for always looking to the Federal Government for help. I do not know whether such criticism is always valid but it certainly is popular. Right now Gettysburg is looking to the Federal Government for help and unless the temper of the Congress changes radically in a very short time, I believe that Gettysburg will look to Washington in vain. The Lord helps those who help themselves. I have a feeling Congress might be inclined to do the same. If the people of Greater Gettysburg—especially the people in the borough of Gettysburg and in Cumberland Township—will move forward on a program such as I have just suggested I am confident that the current negative attitude in Congress could change sharply.

If Gettysburg fails to act and in turn the Congress fails to act then, frankly, I look forward to 1963 and Gettysburg with grave misgivings. Because, as I have noted during the floor debate on March 24, I am afraid that by then, when the spotlight of the Nation and the world is focused on Gettysburg to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the battle, we will discover too late and to our sorrow that the second battle of Gettysburg—the fight to prevent the desecration of this sacred monument by unwarranted commercialization—already has been lost.

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIGLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the gentleman for his excellent statement on the problem that exists at Gettysburg. As a member of the Civil War Centennial Commission I can assure the gentleman that there is a feeling in the Commission and among the Commission members it is, I am quite sure, unanimous, and also among those who have been designated as advisory members of the Commission, that we ought to do something now to preserve the great heritage that exists at Gettysburg. The gentleman stated very well, it seems to me, that Gettysburg was not just another battle. It is the crossroads. It is where the destiny of our country was determined, and we ought to do all we can to preserve it. I recall on one side of the Archives Building is a statement "What is past is prologue," in other words, that the heritage of the past brings forth the future. And, in my opinion, here at Gettysburg we have one of the great heritages and great historic centers of our Nation. I am very glad that the gentleman has explored different possibilities of solution of this problem and that he has taken it up with the people of the community. I want to assure the gentleman as one Member of the Congress on this side that I will do everything I can to help bring about a reversion of the position of the Congress so that we can preserve this valuable site and move forward to make it a more attractive site than it is now.

Mr. QUIGLEY. I thank the gentleman for his remarks. I hope and trust that the Congress of the United States in its ultimate wisdom will reverse the position it took here on March 24. However, as I pointed out, even if it does, this will only serve to correct past mistakes. I do believe and I trust that I will convince the people in the Gettysburg area that as far as the future is concerned, that future is very much in their own hands. The Congress of the United States cannot forever and everlastingly come in with hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars to buy up more and more land. Money is needed, in my judgment, primarily to correct the errors of the past. But, I am convinced that the only ultimate solution of the problem, however much the Members of the Congress might wish it to be otherwise, must come from the people at the local level. It is my hope that they will recognize this and that they will act and act quickly. So quickly, in fact, that the Congress of the United States, having seen how they have acted and how they have reacted to the challenge, will, in turn, reverse its decision and make the money available to the National Park Service. In the end, through the cooperation of all the government units affected, local, State, and National, we hope we will succeed in doing what I believe every Member of the Congress wants to see done, that is, to preserve the Gettysburg battlefield as one of the Nation's true monuments, which is, after all, what it is.

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I was interested in the gentleman's proposition to have a portion of the rent assigned to replace taxes. Now, I have a lot of Federal property in my district, and I recognize the problem that it has created. So, I am sympathetic with this problem, and I am wondering if we can handle this and not disturb all the other arrangements similar to this that have been made with public bodies. In other words, would your proposition be constitutional?

Mr. QUIGLEY. To the best of my knowledge, it would be. I know of one instance involving one national park, Jackson Hole or the Grand Teton, I believe, where an arrangement, not quite identical but with similarities to what I am suggesting here, was enacted by the Congress. This, I believe, happened back in 1950. While I confess I have not made an exhaustive study of the problem, my initial judgment is that there is no constitutional question involved here.

Questions Dictator Castro Did Not Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following questions not answered by Fidel Castro:

First. You said that in case of war between the United States and Communist Russia, Cuba should remain neutral. Do you not think that such an attitude would work in Russia's favor?

Second. The Communist newspaper, Hoy, is now being printed in Havana on presses that you confiscated from their legal owners. Is your Government leasing these presses to the Communists, or did you sell them outright, or did you maybe give them to them?

Third. Former President Figuero, of Costa Rica, said in a speech in Cuba, that in the event of war, Latin American countries should support the United States. Why did you disagree publicly with Figuero on this point?

Fourth. People of the United States have always been friendly toward Cuba. The U.S. Government made absolutely no effort to intervene in your revolution. Why did you say you were ready to kill 200,000 gringos if the United States stepped in to protect American lives and property they own in Cuba?

Fifth. You have said publicly that news agencies, newspapers, and magazines have lied about you and your Government publicly. Would you be specific just who lied?

Sixth. Is it true that unemployment has increased to an alarming degree since you took over the Government in Cuba? Unemployment in private enterprise as well as government agency unemployment?

Seventh. By the way, why did you recently suspend 2,500 schoolteachers?

Eighth. When you attacked army barracks in Santa Ana and were captured and then sentenced to 15 years in prison, Batista, then the head of the Cuban Government, let you out in about a year and a half. Since you have become President of Cuba, why do you not follow the same policies? Or do you find it easier to shoot your prisoners? Is it probably cheaper?

Ninth. You have been looked upon as a fighter in favor of a democracy, and antidictatorship man. Why then do you give orders to your courts, and even ask reversals of decisions from "not guilty" to the "death sentence"? Is that democratic?

Tenth. In the famous trial of the 43 Air Force pilots which took place in Santiago, is it true that they were acquitted and that you showed your disapproval, and that therefore the attorneys were expelled from the courtroom and detained? Among them a lawyer who once defended you?

Is it not a fact that as a result of your orders, a new tribunal was formed under the supervision of your brother, Raul, and that he took the position of the district attorney, as well as the defense minister, and that he then accused his lawyers of being Batista sympathizers?

Eleventh. Is it not also true that these acquitted persons were tried all over again and the majority of them sentenced to 30 years at hard labor?

Twelfth. During the dictatorship which you fought against, the embassies in Havana had no trouble whatsoever in getting out of the country, those persons who took refuge in them? Why is there such a great contrast between what went on under Batista and what goes on today, regarding the right of refuge and asylum?

Thirteenth. You have said that the executions in Cuba would not exceed more than 400—yet there are well over 500 already, and 5,000 are still awaiting trial? Do you think such blood baths, and such purges are becoming to a democratic government that professes love for humanity?

Fourteenth. Is it not true that your mother, Mrs. Lina Ruz Castro—your own mother—has said that during the Batista government she not only had personal guaranty of safety, but that her home and family properties were also protected? Would this policy not be better than the one your government presently engages in?

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER OF NEW YORK

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, 435 years ago, on April 17, 1524, the first white man entered New York Bay and discovered Manhattan Island.

This man was the great Italian navigator and explorer, Giovanni da Verrazzano; a man whose name should rank with those of Columbus, Vespucci, and Magellan, but who instead, has been largely forgotten and ignored. He is rarely, if ever, mentioned in the textbooks and his history is only known to a few scholars. Yet, the fact remains that, 85 years before Henry Hudson and 96 years before the Mayflower pilgrims, Verrazzano had come to these shores, explored them carefully, and told Europe about them.

Giovanni da Verrazzano was born near Florence about 1485. His family was engaged in the trading of spices, silk, and other precious commodities from the Orient. Quite early in life Giovanni acquired his geographical and nautical knowledge in Egypt and Syria. He made his first trip to the New World in 1508 at the age of 23. Some years later he attracted the attention of the King of France who decided to send Verrazzano to discover a northwest passage to Asia. In January 1524, therefore, the navigator set sail on the 100-ton, 3-masted Dauphine. More than 3 months later he landed on the coast of North Carolina and named the new continent Francesca, after the King. He then proceeded northward as far as Newfoundland. En route the Dauphine anchored in New York Bay and was greeted by a group of surprised Indians whom Verrazzano described as agreeable, friendly, and pleasant. Unfortunately, the stay was cut short by an unfavorable wind, but not before New York was given its first name of Angoulgeme. A few years after this historic expedition Verrazzano, while exploring new lands, was captured by the natives and killed.

The contributions of Verrazzano to American history are many. He was the first man to chart and name the harbors, bays, capes, and islands that he discovered, thus opening the path to other voyagers who have come to these shores in ever-growing numbers since then. The principal merit of this great Italian, however, stems from the fact that he was the first European to sail to our shores with the express purpose of exploring them. His voyage has been called one of the most scientific and purposeful of all those made in the 16th century and his report of the voyage one of the most accurate of those written at that time.

Thus Verrazzano Day should serve to keep awake the appreciation and knowledge of our great historical heritage and as a reminder of the cultural relations between the Old and New Worlds that had their beginnings with the famous Florentine explorer, Giovanni da Verrazzano. It should also serve as just one more reminder of the great contributions made by the Italians to these United States.

From Verrazzano and Columbus down through the ages to La Guardia and Fermi the Italians have left their mark on American history and culture.

Dr. Warren Tracy and Coe College Library

OF
HON. LEONARD G. WOLF OF IOWA
Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, as the National Library Week draws to a close, I would like to salute the Stewart Memorial Library, which is a part of Coe College, one of the truly fine liberal arts colleges in my district.

The library, a gift of the late Col. Robert W. Stewart, has recently undergone a facility expansion and physical improvement program. The program, which amounted to $37,763, includes a new lighting system, new stacks and study areas, and new draperies. Other improvements for the library include a microfilm and microcard reader and a verifax photo copier.

This fine progress in the Coe College Library can be attributed to the untiring work of Dr. Warren Tracy, and his fine staff. The staff includes Mrs. Warren Tracy, reference librarian; Mrs. Fred C. Fisher, Jr., and Mrs. Freda Chambers, circulation librarians; Mrs. Donald Stonemen, cataloger, and part-time student workers.

Dr. Tracy, who is now in his fifth year as head librarian, has done a remarkable job of rebuilding the library. With a few grants, and many long hours of work by Dr. Tracy, the library collection now includes 65,000 volumes and 280 periodicals—some dating before the 1900's. Under his leadership exhibits of wider cultural and artistic scope are going to be sponsored by the library similar to the current one; the Gertrude Stein exhibit.

It must be remembered that the universities with their large libraries are not fully responsible for the cultural growth of a city. But rather it is the small liberal arts college libraries, with their small staffs, that have taken the cultural lead in the cities. These staffs, such as the one Dr. Tracy heads, have made the growth of their libraries a very personal one in which the entire city has benefited.

It is indeed an honor to give particular recognition to Dr. Warren Tracy and Coe College for their fine contribution to the liberal arts college library and to their city of Cedar Rapids.

Toll Charges for the St. Lawrence Seaway Are Grossly Inadequate and Once Again the American Taxpayer Is Headed for Another Multi-Million-Dollar Ride

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, recently, it was announced that the United States and Canada had formally set the tolls which ships will be charged to use the St. Lawrence Seaway when it opens late in April. The tolls as announced for moving the length of the entire Seaway from Montreal to Lake Erie will be 6 cents on each ton of a ship's official weight plus 42 cents for each ton of bulk cargo or 95 cents a ton on general cargo.

In my opinion, these tolls will prove to be grossly inadequate and once again the poor taxpayer will be taken for another multi-million-dollar ride. The public who today pays for practically all of the costs of maintaining our entire system of inland waterways, is probably getting used to paying and paying for facilities which benefit only a handful. But that doesn't make it right.

It is inconceivable how the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, the American principal in drafting the tolls, can accomplish with the announced tolls the mandate of the Congress which is self-liquidation within 50 years of the $128 million cost. It is going to be utterly impossible to follow this mandate with inadequate toll charges which are based on highly speculative volumes and an estimate of prospective traffic volume which exceeds the practical capacity of the facilities soon to be opened.

In addition to the provisions of law regarding self-liquidation through toll revenues, there were important economic considerations which Congress must have certainly recognized when it was decided that tolls would be charged. One of the most important of these considerations was the Seaway's effect on the overall costs and adequacy of the Nation's transportation system. Unless the Seaway is fully self-supporting, with no element of subsidy to the users, it cannot possibly contribute to the true economy of the whole transportation picture. In a competitive transportation situation, inadequate tolls are going to create uneconomic transportation patterns by shifting traffic from less costly methods to the more costly, subsidized method.

These inadequate toll charges which will not cover full costs place the railroads on a standby basis. This consequence will be all the more serious and disruptive because the Seaway is only a part-time transportation facility, whereas the Nation for its commerce and defense requires dependable transportation services in both summer and winter. The Nation's transportation requirements for defense obviously do not cease with the close of the navigation season, nor does its commerce hibernate.

Subsidizing the Seaway, through inadequate tolls, further aggravate these factors of instability, with seasonal disturbances of employment. This is in direct conflict with existing aims of national policy to encourage stability of employment conditions in the United States and in its several industries, including the railroads.

To arrive at the charges just announced, the Seaway Corporation, in estimating the annual tonnage that the Seaway could handle, is as far off first base as were the cost estimates presented in 1954 to the Congress to gain approval of the project. The cost estimates have now proven to be unrealistic and it is just a matter of time before there will be two outs. The official estimate of the annual capacity of the Seaway has been for some time 50 million tons—and now a Seaway official has said that it may reach 75 million tons. All I can say about both of these estimates is: fantastic. And I will tell you why.

The main purpose in deepening the St. Lawrence was to encourage oceangoing vessels having a draft of 27 feet or less to serve inland ports on the Great Lakes. In order to reach those ports, these ships must pass through the only connecting link between Lake Ontario and Lake Erie, the Welland Canal.

The capacity of the Welland Canal has generally been recognized as the critical limiting factor governing the volume of traffic that can move through the Seaway. It is amazing to me why the U.S. Tolls Committee in its report of last June said nothing about this very vital matter although a press release accompanying the report mentioned a maximum tonnage of cargo of 60 million tons at Welland. There was absolutely no explanation of how the figure, which of course is totally unrealistic, was picked out of thin air.

The records show that the peak traffic volume through the Welland Canal was 23 million tons in 1956. While I realize that the deepening of the canal and the Seaway to allow passage of ships having drafts up to 27 feet will mean that ships with greater tonnage capacity will use the facilities, it is utterly ridiculous to assume that the tonnage capacity at Welland will ever within the forseeable future reach 60 million tons a year. This, believe it or not, is more than 2½ times the traffic which has ever passed through the canal in 1 year.

Gentlemen, you must understand that the agreed-upon tolls were set using this fantastic tonnage capacity as a starting point and I am sure you are wondering how the Government is ever going to recoup its investment. You can stop wondering because there is not one chance in a thousand that it will.

How am I going to tell my friends back in Altoona, Pa., where the only water we have is Brush Run, which is deep enough for canoes after the rainy season, that they are going to help pay for the deficit which the Government faces because of inadequate tolls for the Seaway? They already know they are helping to contribute close to $40 million each year just to maintain navigation on our inland waterways system and many more millions to improve it. Soon they will be asked to help defray the costs of the Seaway.

And what about the Great Lakes, the nearest of which is almost 200 miles from my district. In a recent statement, commenting on the fact that the imposition of any tolls on the Seaway constituted a distinct threat to the economic well-being of the Great Lakes area, Adm. Lyndon Spencer, president of the Lake Carriers' Association, said:

> The Great Lakes are a natural highway for moving grain from western growing centers to eastern consuming centers.

Certainly the Great Lakes are a natural highway that no ships could use unless harbors were deepened, locks maintained, and channels dredged. Do you know how much the Government has spent to date on this natural highway—more than $500 million of your money and mine.

Many people have said that the recession caused most of the unemployment in the railroad industry that exists today. Perhaps it caused some layoffs, but to me a principal cause has and will continue to be the Government's subsidizing the water carriers. This must be curtailed.

But let us get back to the Welland Canal and its capacity. I wonder if the Development Corporation when it suggested the tolls which are supposed to cover the costs of the Seaway understood what the workable capacity of Welland meant. Certainly much more is involved than figuring the maximum number of lockages that can be performed per day and multiplying by the number of days in the navigation season to obtain a total of physical capacity in lockages. If they made this kind of mathematical caper, we are in for trouble.

In determining tonnage capacity, allowances should have been made for interruptions because of adverse weather and accidents. More important still is the fact that the traffic will not flow with uniform regularity all hours of the day, in all days of the peak month, in all months of the navigation season, or from one navigation season to another. These variations of traffic have a pronounced downward effect upon the practical capacity of the canal and should have been used as a basis in formulating toll levels to cover costs.

Available data clearly show that traffic at Welland is not evenly spaced throughout the navigation season, but starts off slowly, rises to a summer peak, and tapers off with the approach of cold weather. Therefore, any calculation of Welland's capacity that treats every day or month of the navigation season as equivalent is certain to involve substantial error and cannot represent the effective capacity.

So it is also with respect to year-to-year variations in traffic resulting from fluctuations in the general economy. This simply means that the top capacity of Welland, whatever it may be, will not be used every year, owing to business fluctuations affecting such major commodities as ore, grain, coal, as well as others. On the average, over a period of years, it is unlikely for this reason that the full annual capacity of Welland would be used to a greater extent than 90 percent, since the capacity cannot be exceeded but utilization will frequently fall below it. Over the 10 years from 1948 through 1957, for example, the volume of bulk freight on the Great Lakes ranged from a high of 200 million tons in 1953 to a low of 151 million tons in 1954. A realistic determination of toll levels should have taken these cyclical fluctuations into account.

Summing up all of these pertinent considerations, and giving them a realistic evaluation, points out clearly that the effective capacity of Welland cannot exceed 40 million tons and will be less than that year in and year out. This would allow for a maximum of 7,200 transits, with more large vessels than have used the canal up to now and fewer possibilities than in the past for multiple transits. It also allows for greater average cargo tonnage per vessel transited, but there appears to be no reason to assume that the average cargo tons per transit will exceed 5,500 tons at any time in the foreseeable future, which is more than twice as great as the average in recent years. There will be very probably some larger vessels, but there will also continue to be many small ones and empty ones to keep the average size of the vessels from soaring as the unrestrained optimists have led us to believe.

I am sure that if you agree with my analysis of the cargo tonnage capacity of Welland, which I think is very realistic, it goes without saying that the 40 million ton figure provides the top limit of tonnage that should have been taken as a basis for determining appropriate tolls for the St. Lawrence Seaway and for Welland.

Unfortunately for the taxpayer, the Tolls Committee in recognition of the functional relationship between the St. Lawrence and the Welland Canal has set the maximum seaway traffic at 50 million tons compared with 60 million tons for Welland. The difference of 10 million tons is principally accounted for by interlake traffic which does not use the St. Lawrence River. Very probably this interlake traffic will expand and further reduce the remaining seaway traffic potential as affected by Welland.

Since my analysis shows that the Tolls Committee has overestimated the Welland capacity by at least 20 million tons, it has likewise overestimated the available traffic potential of the Seaway in the St. Lawrence by at least the same amount. Hence, the maximum traffic for the Seaway will be no more than 30 million tons instead of 50 million tons. This means that the Seaway revenues as calculated by the Tolls Committee on the basis of the agreed upon tolls will suffice to cover only 60 percent of the Seaway costs, thus falling far short of the requirements of law with respect to self-liquidation.

It is indeed unfortunate that those responsible for setting the tolls did not fully take into account a realistic tonnage capacity for Welland. If they had it would have been clear that considerably higher tolls were necessary to effect self-liquidation within the required period. I am sure the higher tolls would not have discouraged ships from using the Seaway because traffic that will become firmly attached to this route as the most advantageous means of transportation can afford to pay full-cost tolls. I can see no need to offer a bargain variety of tolls for traffic which can be realistically expected to develop for the Seaway on an economic basis. And yet, this is what has been done as the Seaway prepares to open for its navigation season.

Although the law states that a review of the situation must be made before July 1, 1964, this is much too long to wait if we are ever going to rectify the mistakes that have already been made. I therefore strongly urge that the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation should insist that, after the close of the navigation season in 1960, a review of the toll charges be made to determine how much the tolls should be raised. After two full seasons, sufficient statistics should have been developed which will show whether we are collecting enough to cover our costs. I am sure these figures when they are made public, will show the absolute necessity for making an upward readjustment of tolls for the Seaway and the canal.

Social Security Makes Nickel-Shooter of Ponzi

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks I submit the following broadcast I made over the Manion Forum Network on Sunday evening, April 12, 1959, when discussing the inequities and faults of our present old age security insurance system. I do so principally for the enlightenment and edification of the many new Members of Congress.

Dean MANION. I think it was Mark Twain who first said that everybody talks about the weather but nobody does anything about it. With our social security system, it is just the opposite. Everybody pays for it, but practically nobody talks about it.

The clever Washington bureaucrats who manage the involved, inexplicable mishmash, known as the Federal social security system, have made it into a political sacred cow. No matter where it roams, what it does, or how precariously it teeters on the brink of bankruptcy, no politician who equates his own chances for reelection with the public interest will dare to remonstrate.

In the handbook of practical politics, it says that all the ambitious Congressman is supposed to do about social security is to raise the benefits and spread the coverage. If he should happen to question the obvious vandalism of thus burning the taxpayer's candle at both ends, he will be deluged with vituperation as a calloused enemy of our needy old people.

Fortunately, there are a few Congressmen in Washington who do not quail before the menacing public relations octopus of the Federal Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and who thus dare to tell the awful truth about our present social security system.

I have one of these courageous Congressmen with me at this microphone now. Representative NOAH MORGAN MASON, of Illinois, has been a Member of Congress for 20 years. His firmly established reputation for honest, enlightened statesmanship enabled him to throw away the political handbook years ago. I am sure you will agree that his candor is refreshing and that his logic is irrefutable.

Here is my greatly respected friend, Congressman MASON.

Congressman MASON. Thank you, Dean Manion, for those kind words of introduction. I am both honored and delighted to be given this opportunity to speak to your Sunday evening radio audience on the subject of social security. It is a difficult subject to understand or to explain.

Our present social security setup is unsound, inequitable and dishonest. The Brookings Institution, one of the best research organizations in the United States today, after a careful and exhaustive study, recommended that our social security setup be scrapped, abandoned, and that a pay-as-you-go social security program be established in its place.

I agree with that recommendation. If it were adopted and carried out, it would mean, as the Brookings Institution expresses it: "Our generation would care for its own old people and trust future generations to do likewise."

In 1950, after 3½ months of exhaustive hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, I was one of the three members of that committee who voted "no" on a bill that proposed to expand the coverage of social security and to increase the benefits. I was also 1 of 14 House Members to vote "no" on the final passage of that bill in the House.

Since then, I have opposed every attempt to expand our social security program, to increase its benefits, or to increase the social security tax rates. Yet, I am heartily in favor of a sound, liberal social security program to take care of our needy old people.

UNSOUND, DISHONEST, INEQUITABLE

The overwhelming weight of the evidence gathered during the 3½ months of public hearings in 1950 was to the effect that our present social security setup was unsound, dishonest, and inequitable, that it was "a Ponzi-type shell game," sold to the American people, by F.D.R. and his New Deal associates, as a plan to provide security in their old age.

It is an insurance program which if practiced by any insurance company today would land every director and every official of that company in the penitentiary for misuse or misappropriation of trust funds.

The present social security program is characterized in a report of the Brookings Institution as a plan whereby "we (the present generation) do the promising; you (all future generations) do the paying." That is an accurate picture of our present social security program.

The following social security facts bear out these contentions; they cannot be ignored:

First. When the social security law was adopted in 1934, it provided that all money collected in social security taxes should be dumped into the Federal Treasury and that such cash could be used for the general expenditures of the Government, placing Government I O U's or bonds into the social security fund in lieu of the cash as a bookkeeping arrangement. That provision is still in the law.

Second. Under the law, some $50 billion has been collected in social security taxes, but less than half that amount has been paid out in benefits. The balance—all spent for the general expenditures of the Government—is a debt that has been placed upon the backs of future generations.

Taxing American workers to get money to pay social security benefits to the workers upon retirement, then spending half the money collected for other purposes is neither fair nor equitable.

Third. Our social security program, since its inception, has been used for political purposes by both parties. In election years, benefits have been increased to attract votes for the party in power, thereby making the social security fund actuarily unsound.

Then, in the off-election year, the social security tax rates have been increased to try to get the fund back on an actuarily sound basis. (If that is not playing politics with the welfare of our retired old people, I do not know what is.)

Fourth. The original purpose of the social security program was to establish a floor of security under the low-income worker for support in his old age. He was then expected to build upon that floor added security by buying insurance, by establishing a savings account, or by making investments with his extra cash.

To make this possible, a tax was levied only upon the first $2,000 of the worker's income. Today, we levy a tax upon the first $4,800 of the worker's income, leaving little if any cash for the taxpayer to invest for himself.

We have entirely forgotten the original purpose of social security. Today, Uncle Sam acts as though the worker is not capable of spending his own money wisely, for security in his old age; therefore, the Government must do it for him.

SHOULD BE ON PAY-AS-YOU-GO BASIS

These facts—and they are facts—added to the evidence given in the public hearings in 1950, convince me that we should, without further delay, adopt the social security recommendations of the Brookings Institution and place the social security program upon a cash basis—a pay-as-you-go basis.

If we did that, it would eliminate the present yearly $500 million interest charge upon our fictitious social security fund—which will soon become a $1 billion interest charge.

It also would do away with all need for reserves, all need for level premiums, all need for costly and elaborate bookkeeping systems, all need for the present heavy administrative costs of social security, and it would make possible the payment of more liberal social security benefits to our retired old people in the lower income brackets. That in itself would be well worthwhile.

To demonstrate how unsound and dishonest our present social security program is, I offer the following hypothetical case:

John Smith decides to establish his own social security program, so he deducts a certain percent of each pay check he receives and places the cash regularly in his safe deposit box. After doing this for several years and having thus set aside, say, $5,000, to insure security in his old age, John Smith starts to spend each month more than he earns—as Uncle Sam does now.

Then, John Smith hits upon the plan of taking a certain amount of cash out of his lockbox each month to spend, placing in the box, in lieu of the cash extracted, promissory notes to himself. If John Smith keeps this up, when he retires he will have only promissory notes to himself to live on—which he has no way of changing into cash for groceries.

That is exactly what Uncle Sam is doing with the social security tax receipts—the only difference being that Uncle Sam has the general taxing power to invoke in order to change his I O U's into cash to meet his future social security obligations.

But, that means of course new taxes, additional taxes, to meet obligations that are supposed to have been paid for already by the beneficiaries.

I wonder if that scheme of taxing the children and grandchildren of the social security beneficiary for something he and his employer are supposed to have paid for can be called anything but dishonest and immoral, a Ponzi-type shell game that has been sold to the American taxpayer as a plan to provide security in his old age.

For years I have been working in Congress, not to abolish social security, as some people would have you believe, but rather to place our social security program upon a sound basis, a cash basis, a pay-as-you-go basis, collecting each year just the amount of social security taxes needed to pay the benefits due that year for the support of our retired old people.

In that way—paraphrasing the words of the Brookings Institution report—we (the present generation) would take care of our own old people, and you (all future generations) would be expected to do likewise. To my mind, that would be the sensible thing to do in connection with our social security problem.

Dean MANION. Thank you, Congressman NOAH MASON. Now, my friends, do you see any reason why the irrefutable truth that Congressman MASON has just spoken should not be brought to the millions who are now being ruthlessly taxed under the false pretense that they are thus providing for their old age?

We must take care of our needy old people and that is the very reason why the present so-called social security system, which is merely taxation with misrepresentation, should be changed for something that will do the necessary job.

Send Congressman MASON'S speech to your Congressman. Ask him to give you his frank opinion on the merits of what Congressman MASON has suggested.

OF
OF CALIFORNIA
Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most honorable gentlemen, courageous and patriotic men, able and dedicated public servants it has been my privilege to know is Lewis L. Strauss. He is gentle; he is kind; he is humble; he possesses the quality of greatness that in our history such rare men as he have given as a heritage to the Nation. At the moment he is enduring a prolonged and difficult personal trial. It is good that those who know, admire, and respect him speak words of encouragement at this time.

Anniversary of Lincoln's West Virginia Statehood Proclamation

HON. KEN HECHLER OF WEST VIRGINIA
Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, today is an important date in the history of my home State of West Virginia. On this date 96 years ago, the Great Emancipator, President Abraham Lincoln, signed the proclamation that designated West Virginia a new State.

The actual admission of West Virginia into the Union came 60 days later, on June 20, 1863, under the terms of President Lincoln's proclamation. This latter date is celebrated as West Virginia Day in our State, but the confirmation of its entry into the Union occurred on April 20.

President Lincoln, sorely beset by the crushing burden of wartime leadership, probably had little time to reflect on the consequences and importance of his action. But there is little doubt that the formation of this new State was widely acclaimed. The courageous stand against slavery—and particularly against being drawn into war with the indissoluble Union—which the hardy and independent mountain folk had taken was thus rewarded with status as a free and equal State, and deservedly so.

It is an oversimplification, however, to say that the western counties broke away from the mother State over the issue of slavery alone. This was a contributing factor, but not the only one by any means.

There had long been sentiment for the creation of a separate State west of the crest of the Appalachians.

Geographically, the mountaineers who settled the slopes and valleys of West Virginia were much closer to their neighbors in the Ohio Valley than to other sections.

By sentiment, too, the western Virginian belonged with his hardy counterparts in Kentucky and Ohio. The mountaineer, struggling to forge a better life for his family amid the towering, forbidding mountains, felt that the voice of the mountain dweller—then as today—was not always heard.

Thus, we can see that in many respects—in fact, in almost all respects—the stage was set for West Virginia statehood long before the slave issue set the Nation aflame. There had been repeated efforts to form a separate State long before the war triggered the final break.

West Virginia has come a long way since then. Vast deposits of untold mineral wealth have poured from her mountains, particularly in the unbelievably rich coalfields to the south. Chemical, glass and steel manufacturers have chosen the many resources of the State in the manufacture of their products. Her forests are still undepleted, although millions of feet of timber have been taken from her majestic hills.

This growth might have been slowed, might possibly never have attained its present stature at all, had not President Lincoln determined to permit this economic entity to become a separate State 96 years ago today.

Today, the State of West Virginia already is making forward-looking plans for its centennial, 4 years hence in 1963. Already, elaborate preparations are being made to pay fitting tribute to a great State entering its second century. Realistic and thoughtful planning is being done in regard to West Virginia's future, in an attempt to assure that the second century will be even greater in achievement than the first.

It is only fitting that we pause, as these many preparations gain momentum, to pay tribute to the great American who affixed his signature to the document that proclaimed West Virginia's birth, during the year that marks the 150th anniversary of his birth.

Under unanimous consent I at this point insert the text of Abraham Lincoln's proclamation of April 20, 1863:

PROCLAMATION ADMITTING WEST VIRGINIA INTO THE UNION, APRIL 20, 1863, BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Whereas by the act of Congress approved the 31st day of December last, the State of West Virginia was declared to be one of the United States of America, and was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, upon the condition that certain changes should be duly made in the proposed constitution for that State; and

Whereas proof of a compliance with that condition, as required by the second section of the act aforesaid, has been submitted to me:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby, in pursuance of the act of Congress aforesaid, declare and proclaim that the said act shall take effect and be in force from and after 60 days from the date hereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 20th day of April, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the independence of the United States the 87th.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President:
WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

District Home Rule

OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, in his famous Cataline oration, that great

Roman statesman, Cicero, spoke seven words which legions of schoolboys over the intervening centuries have committed to memory. These words are:

Quo usque tandem abutere, Catalina, patientia nostra.

How long, oh Cataline, will you abuse our patience?

The sense of frustration which Cicero expressed in the Roman Senate is one that we experience from time to time in this modern forum of representative government.

It is one that aptly describes my personal sentiments when I contemplate the situation of home-rule legislation in this body today. After years of study and despite the broad support for this bill, we have, at this hour, gotten exactly nowhere in obtaining consideration of the bill by the District Committee.

It is not as if this legislation were new or revolutionary. This home-rule bill has passed the Senate four times in the last five Congresses. It is presently being heard by the Senate District Committee.

It is not that there is no interest in the bill. Twenty-three Members of this House, of both parties, have introduced the legislation.

It is not that the bill has no urgency attached to it. The president of the District Commissioners has characterized it as the most important piece of legislation affecting the District before the Congress.

Nor can one say that there is little sentiment in favor of home rule in the District itself. In the District Democratic primary of 1956, nearly 80 percent of the voters expressed their support. Similarly, in a recent Republican mail poll, two-thirds were for it.

No, it is not lack of support, lack of interest or lack of importance that have stalled action. It is because there is wide support and interest—because the majority of the Members of this House are anxious to vote in favor of home-rule legislation—that the legislative process has been obstructed. Such obstructionism abuses our patience. How long will it last?

Washington Report

OF

OF TEXAS

Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newsletter of April 18, 1959:

(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas, April 18, 1959)

Cherry blossoms amid balmy weather, snow, and bright 80-degree sunshine, in that order, make a strange week—but that's spring in Washington. Visitors are everywhere, enjoying sightseeing. Republican women from Dallas, Tex., and the Nation are here, holding their annual conference. It's a compliment to Congressmen to have visitors from home who will take the time to observe the legislative process. A Congressman's job would be better understood if constituents could see the committee work, where hearings are held and legislation fashioned. Then, the floor work in the House, and finally the endless office routine of correspondence over the problems of constituents. Frequently, all activities are simultaneous.

The Federal Government has grown so large in recent years it is now likely that legislation suffers from a lack of study by the Congressmen, who are besieged with countless other duties. Worse yet, this fact will go unrecognized so that Government getting out of hand will not be blamed on the right cause, namely, too little time to do too many things. Other charges will be made, and more legislation devised to correct legislation. Meanwhile, the water is muddied further by political parties that choose up sides with too hasty study of the facts. Only as a result of careful study of alternatives can the successful solutions to today's problems be found. Often, the obvious is most difficult to see. (Item: A Member sent a package of sightsavers made in his district to each Congressman saying, "We are entering that period of the session when budget figures will be flying fast and furiously. I trust these will assist you in seeing the figures more clearly.")

The military construction bill totaled $1,251 million for defense construction, $131 million of which is outside the United States and $548 million approximately is classified (secret). The bill includes such items as operational and training facilities, maintenance, research and development and test, hospital and medical facilities, housing, utilities and real estate. Texas' part is $28 million, including $348,000 for Dallas' Naval Air Station and $64,000 for the Army Reserve Center.

The military is big business in this Nation, even in this relatively small construction end. In fact, defense expenditures are so great and so integral a part of this Nation's economy, I wonder what would happen if Russia actually wanted peace, and we were suddenly faced with disarmament and demilitarizing. Could a nation of free people and business rooted in free enterprise survive competitively, as compared to the regimented societies of totalitarian states where people can be ordered about? Here's one to think about.

The Bob Taft Memorial Carillon Tower symbolizes the side of America that everyone can cherish and in remembering try to emulate, thanking God for the opportunity and freedom to do so. At the dedication these qualities came to the forefront, and refreshingly, without apology. Bob Taft laid down principles and then followed them, even when odds were great, when pressures against him were almost unbearable. Ambition and power were sacrificed when he relinquished seniority privileges to join another committee to write a labor law, which he reasoned then was the Nation's great need. Conscience was his guide, not political popularity. And when it came time to die, knowing this in advance, he met this without missing a stride. As he told Herbert Hoover, who urged him to go to the hospital, "My friend, you know what is the matter with me. I am going to die with my boots on." Here's American manhood at its best. As Mr. Hoover said, "In the belfry of this monument there is a magnificent carillon. When these great bells ring out, it will be a summons to integrity and courage." Congressmen should hear and heed these bells. Bob Taft's memory will help all Americans.

Our Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, was resoundingly praised in the House when his retirement from office was announced. I wondered why he couldn't have received some of this praise earlier when instead his critics were denouncing him, chiefly for his unyielding firmness toward Russia. Like Taft, he may be appreciated more in the future, when those who counseled him to give in to Russia are long forgotten.

Why are so many of our greatest and strongest men removed from the scene when they are so badly needed? Lincoln, Taft, Senate Chaplain Peter Marshall, to name only three of the many. An even heavier load is distributed among those who remain. In this world we have a big job to do for ourselves, our children, and future generations. To this task we had better dedicate ourselves.

Remembering Taft's beliefs in the role of Federal Government would be so helpful today. For example: "This was the way America was built up. The only way to resume progress is to assure people again that Government will not interfere with their normal and reasonable efforts to make a living; that Government will not take away from them the profit which they make; that reasonable success will receive the recognition it deserves."

OF

HON. GEORGE HUDDLESTON, JR.

OF ALABAMA

Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, in the March 12 issue of the County Herald, the journal of the Jefferson County (Ala.) Teachers Association, there was published an article which I prepared for this periodical entitled "International Aspects of Education." With the thought that the article might be of interest to the Members of Congress, I am pleased to insert same herewith in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

INTERNATIONAL ASPECTS OF EDUCATION

We tend, so very often, to think about education in terms of the local viewpoint only. When education is mentioned our thoughts run straight to underpaid teachers, to crowded classrooms, to inadequate counseling and guidance for students, to the current American debate between the progressive educationists and the neoorthodox three R's supporters, and the question of whether Johnny and Janie can read. It is all well and good that we should indeed think first in terms of local education, for it is, obviously, on the local front that our efforts in behalf of better educational systems and methods and facilities have the most effect. Or I should say, it is on the city and county and State educational levels that we can most readily tell whether our efforts are having any effect whatsoever.

In any case, it is natural to consider education to be an immediate and intimate concern. What subject is there that receives more comment in the discussion of local affairs than this? Indeed, all of us talk about education and its needs, many of us worry about the problem, and a lot of us even try to do something about it.

Nevertheless, even if it is well and good and natural to think on education from the standpoint of what it means to Birmingham or Graysville or Shades Mountain, to Jefferson or Lamar or Baldwin Counties, or to the State of Alabama, I think we are detracting from the significance of the word if we do not extend our concept and consideration of education to an international scope.

How trite it must seem to you to read that your Congressman says that "the world is growing smaller each day" and that "today's foreigners are tomorrow's neighbors." And yet, how true. Is there anyone who has failed to be awed by the fact that jet planes and, more frightening, intercontinental ballistic missiles have stretched the meaning of "proximity" to include the entire world; distance is now so relative a term that it is measured in minutes and hours and only very rarely still in miles.

"Fly to Atlanta in 31 minutes," invites a local airline office. By the time most of you straighten up your desks at the end of the day, gather up your papers to grade and that complicated old Register to work on, and finally arrive home, the business executive who left Birmingham by plane at 3 p.m. is halfway to Washington. And on Saturday, if you are able to indulge yourselves and sleep 'til noon, do you realiez that the tourist who boarded the jet airliner in New York at 6:30 a.m.—the time you ordinarily have to get up—is now almost able to see the West England shore?

In saying that the world is becoming evermore smaller, we actually should be able to mean that our own private worlds are being enlarged. This brings us rather abruptly to one of the main points I am trying to make: education, as we look at it in and from Alabama, is, like travel, today necessarily considered universal in breadth. What we are doing in our local schools should not be automatically divorced from what the rest of the world is attempting to do in and through its educational institutions.

And yet there arises at this point a rather stinging question. If science and research and advanced knowledge—if education, in its broadest sense—have brought the nations of the world so close together, in the connotation that distance barriers have been broken down, what have science and technical skills and general education done to bring those human beings affected by this collapse of isolating geographical boundaries closer together from a different and more important standpoint?

How ironic it is that in an age when it is proclaimed that the moon is shortly to be visited by man, said man cannot seem to bridge the cultural gap between himself and people of the next hemisphere. How ironic that in an age when the suggestion that we may soon have to deal with Martians is not always made jestingly, Americans cannot not only not deal successfully and peacefully with the Russians who are their earthly enemies, but cannot even understand and deal with their longtime friends and neighbors in Latin America without great difficulty and many unnecessary misunderstandings.

I now proceed to answer part of that stinging question of what is being done in the field of education to narrow the cultural distances that still cause us to be in large measure intellectually confined to our own backyards. I will attempt to give only part of the answer because there is another part, even the most vital part, of the question that you yourselves must provide the answer to, and that is this: whatever we have done and are doing educationally to bring mankind on earth closer together in understanding and mutual appreciation, is it the right thing and have we done enough of it?

Perhaps my giving one answer to the question will enable you to consider more intelligently what your completing answer shall be. It is my hope that this is the case.

What America has done in international education is, quite naturally, largely synonymous with what the U.S. Government has done. By far the largest programs of international educational exchange are supported, totally or in part, by the Federal Government. But as these programs are based on the approval and support of the electorate, the Government's efforts in this field can, without stretching the point excessively, be equated with the efforts of the American people.

It was in connection with President Roosevelt's good neighbor policy with Latin America that the U.S. Government made its first significant commitment in the field of international education. A year after the Convention for the Promotion of Inter-American Cultural Relations had met in Buenos Aires in 1936, the Congress of the United States gave statutory authority for a broad program of exchange of persons betwen the United States and other American Republics to the end of extending scientific, technical, and general cultural relations with these countries.

The Second World War interrupted continuing development of such programs. It was that war, however, which was surely the most singularly shocking factor in our final realization that international cultural and educational exchanges were vitally necessary if peace was to prevail, however shakily, in the world. Thus it was that at the end of the war the U.S. Congress overwhelmingly approved a measure introduced by Senator WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas, to use some of the currencies and credits of other countries acquired by the United States through the sale of surplus property abroad for educational purposes. Two years later, in 1948, the United States Informational and Educational Exchange Act (often called the Smith-Mundt Act) authorized a worldwide program of broad purposes. Its intent was to "enable the Government of the United States to promote a better understanding of the United States in other countries, and to increase the mutual understanding between the people of the United States and the people of other countries," by providing for "an educational service to cooperate with other nations in (a) the interchange of persons, knowledge, and skills; (b) the rendering of technical and other services; and (c) the interchange of developments in the field of education, the arts, and sciences."

In addition, several other acts of Congress have provided for particular and distinctive educational exchanges with specific countries; such agreements exist with Finland and India, for example.

Aside from the international educational exchange programs which are operated mainly under the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt Acts by the Department of State, there are two other principal programs that relate to higher education. One is the program of educational activities of the International Cooperation Administration (ICA) which includes mainly the technical cooperation program authorized by the Mutual Security Act of 1954. The other is the basic program of the U.S. Information Agency (USIA) which is largely educational in nature and includes distinctly educational pursuits and aids.

There are some programs of international exchange on the secondary school level that are partially supported by the Government and I shall shortly deal with them and raise the question of whether they should receive extended support.

To summarize briefly the differences between the main programs related to higher education in general, the primary objective of the Smith-Mundt and the Fulbright programs is to increase international understanding to understanding abroad of the United States, its culture, and its foreign policy. This is done by sending American grantees abroad and bringing foreign nationals to this country, keeping this prime objective in mind. The specific educational or technical activities of the individuals involved in this program are of secondary interest.

In the ICA program, in contrast, the primary objective is to increase some specific technical competence abroad with specific ICA-sponsored projects. For example, prior to the building of a dam in Iran using joint American and Iranian funds, U.S. technicians are selected and sent overseas and/or Iranian engineers are brought to this country with the objective of accomplishing a particular technical-educational aim relative to the project.

The USIA has a multipurposed and broad-ranged field of activity. Through their offices located in principal foreign cities, they disseminate general information about the United States to anyone who requests it. Aside from sponsoring regular programs, such as providing public libraries where foreigners can obtain copies of every important American literary work, the USIA cooperates with American teacher-grantees by providing them background information for lectures, films on various aspects of our country, and such free souvenirs as maps of the United States to be distributed. They are also called upon to provide similar information to such study groups, civic organizations, and particular individuals as request them in those areas where there are offices of the Agency. There is no doubt that the USIA activity of supplying millions of dollars worth of American texts to foreign universities and secondary schools markedly affects instruction in these educational institutions, and this is particularly true in the underdeveloped countries.

Under the Fulbright Act of 1946, particular bilateral arrangements were authorized between the United States and individual nations. Made through the executive branch of the Government, these agreements provide for the exchange of persons for educational purposes. By the present time, 39 countries have concluded agreements with the United States to participate in this program. This program also permits granting of scholarships to foreign nationals to study in American-sponsored schools abroad. In the first year of its implemented existence (1948), the act saw an exchange of some 237 persons. This number has increased steadily, with the increased number of bilateral agreements involved, until by 1957 there were some 6,000 participants in the program that year. About one-third of these were Americans who went abroad to study at the university or graduate level, to teach on secondary or university level, to engage in particular research projects, to act as consultants to foreign governments or organizations, or to lecture before general audiences on topics of current interest. The remaining two-thirds of the participants were foreign nationals who engaged generally in the same type activities in this country.

Under the Smith-Mundt Act, which calls for exchange of persons for the same type purpose but promotes more specifically programs sponsored by academic institutions, libraries, nonprofit organizations, and business and industrial organizations, the number of persons participating each year has also grown to about 6,000 in the past few years. Under both the Smith-Mundt Act and the Fulbright Act, over 50,000 persons have participated in this international educational exchange.

The total cost of the two programs has grown to almost $25 million per annum, but it is well to remember that this is in large measure provided by what amounts to interest on wartime loans to foreign nations and by the sale of surplus property in foreign countries claimed by the United States as partial payment of debts owed to our Government by those countries.

There are several other programs carried on by the Government that should be mentioned. One of these is the cultural presentations staff, established by Congress in 1954 at the request of the President, which has undertaken a program to assist cultural and athletic groups with foreign tours. This proved to be such a successful venture that 2 years after the program was set up by Congress on an emergency basis, it was made into a continuing activity by that body in an act approved August 1, 1956. Under the auspices of this program, over 2,500 American artists and athletes have performed in over 90 foreign countries.

This activity, along with special ones like our presentations at the recent World's Fair at Brussels, may not in the strictest sense deal with education. But it does, after all, educate those who view the presentations, of whatever nature, in the ways of American culture and tradition, and does so in a manner that perhaps cannot be equaled in any other way.

One of the most recent developments in the area of educational and cultural exchanges was the recent agreement between our Government and the U.S.S.R. to swap movies, radio, and television broadcasts, and magazines as well as exchange professors and graduate students for a period of 2 years, beginning in January 1958. Other exchanges are to take place between athletic teams and outstanding entertainment groups and artists. The most significant venture on the part of the United States under this agreement is the upcoming merchandise fair our Government is sponsoring in Moscow to show off our outstanding peaceable commodities, commonplace to us but which the average Russian will surely look on in wonder. Who can doubt whether this will make for good propaganda for our Nation in Russia?

In other areas of student exchange outside the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt Acts, the State Department also makes a contribution. Each year for the past several years, the Department has given grants-in-aid to such groups as the American Field Service. This is the largest of 5 privately sponsored organizations that promotes the exchange of students on the high school level. It is this program which perhaps presents the most interesting aspect of international education to you, for foreign exchange students are currently placed in several schools in Birmingham, Jefferson County, and Alabama. Perhaps you know first hand how very much one student from Norway or France or Germany can do to increase your students' interest in that country and to increase even community interest in learning about social and educational practices of foreign countries. Even a spark of such interest, when kindled by an interesting personality in the form of an exchange student, can result in solid friendships and greater mutual appreciation.

And I think I should mention that even a more important result of having exchange students in our high schools is that our young Americans take another look at our own culture and our own institutions in order better to answer the questions put to them by the "foreigner"; they know that for him it is not just an academic question, as is the case when a teacher poses it and already knows the book answer, but an innocent and sincere one that demands a thoughtful reply.

This program of high school student exchanges reached a number of 1,500 participants in 1958. They came from 38 countries. The Government subsidy of this program, in the form of grants-in-aid from the Department of State amounted to $125,000 in that year, a very small sum compared to the amounts spent in connection with exchanges on the university and higher educational levels. I wonder if it is your experience that this program is sufficently worthwhile to be enlarged and to receive greater Government support?

To refer again to the program affecting higher education, a recent survey was made by the U.S. Advisory Commission of Educational Exchange of the views of college presidents whose institutions were involved in student and teacher international exchanges. These men indicated their belief that the program has benefited higher education in several particular ways. One was that the caliber of the foreign scholarship winners to the United States was so superior that it enabled admissions officers to set up proper criteria for admitting other foreign students who wish to study independently. Another was that foreign students make important contributions to academic and community life especially through the interpretation of their cultures to the American people. They further said that presence of foreign students on the campus stimulates among the student body and faculty an increased interest in foreign affairs, and this is particularly true as regards those individuals who do not specialize in foreign languages or international affairs.

That the effect of those who have studied or taught abroad is beneficial to the institution to which an individual returns in the United States is, I think, almost universally true. There can be no question that foreign study is an immense boon to language teachers.

And finally, in most instances, those Americans who go abroad to teach, study, lecture, or engage in research, are generally successful in presenting the American way of life, the American culture, and the American viewpoint.

It will perhaps be of particular interest to you to have the report of a friend of mine recently returned from a year's study in Europe that even regional American cultures and traditions are appreciated by the European student of America. He states that one of the most popular courses taught at the University of Strasbourg, by an American Fulbright professor of English, was on the works of Mark Twain. Thus a greater understanding of America and Americans was gained by analyzing a particular region during a particular period. This should be reassuring to those of us who are concerned lest our friends across the seas think of us in terms of Brooklyn accents and Hollywood riches.

There have, of course, been areas of dissatisfaction with these programs. Foreign students complain sometimes that they have not been able to get the type of education for which they came here. Some have manifested a general inability to adjust appropriately to the American system of education which differs so widely from their own. Likewise, Americans gone abroad to study or teach often find that language barriers and local social customs sometimes make it extremely difficult to become sufficiently acquainted with the local populace to do any educating along the general lines proposed as the main point of the program, that is, the familiarization of foreign friends with the American culture and viewpoint.

One of these difficulties, it might be mentioned here, is the result of our all too meager emphasis on foreign languages in secondary and higher education. It is to be hoped this situation will shortly be ameliorated.

Such then is the general picture of the program of international education currently being carried on by the U.S. Government. It is not by any means the complete picture, but perhaps it will suffice to stir your thoughts and inquiries on the subject. I insist again that it is indeed important that you and I, along with those who are perhaps not so intimately connected with education, do take time to consider the subject from an international viewpoint.

Those who are today's students are tomorrow's teachers of men; and if there is a student or a potential student in any part of the world who is today denied access to the light of truth, it may well be he who helps bring darkness on the world tomorrow.

U.S.S. "Bryce Canyon": U.S. Good Will

OF

Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most effective instruments for creating goodwill abroad for the United States of America has come to be the officers and men of the U.S. Navy. Wherever they travel the wearers of our naval uniform regard gaining respect and friendship for our country as important a part of the duty to which they have devoted themselves as manning and fighting their ships if ever needs be.

Officers and men of the U.S.S. Bryce Canyon, homeported at Long Beach, Calif., and now serving in the Philippines, are typical of Americans in uniform doubling as people-to-people ambassadors of goodwill.

Recently, within little more than a week's period, several fine gestures of friendship to the people of the Philippines were signalled from the Bryce Canyon.

The ship established a $500 scholarship trust fund to provide a young Filipino of Olongapo with a year's instruction at the Feati Institute of Technology in Manila.

In announcing the scholarship, Capt. E. H. Steinmetz, USN, commanding officer of the destroyer tender, said:

Our officers and men raised the funds to provide an opportunity for a particularly deserving young man of Olongapo to further his education in the industrial arts field. The young man to be selected must have a demonstrated aptitude and capability for training in the industrial arts, must be of excellent character and moral integrity, must be financially unable to continue his education without assistance and must not be directly related to any active or retired U.S. Armed Forces personnel.

The Bryce Canyon spends most of her time in port at Subic Bay—and in appreciation of the very good relations we enjoy with the Philippine citizens of Olongapo we wanted to offer some needy young man with ability the chance to go to college. We wanted to demonstrate our thanks to his townspeople for their many kindnesses to us.

Just a few days earlier 11 officers and men of the Bryce Canyon had gone ashore on a mission of mercy. A 38-year-old woman lay dying in the Olongapo Hospital suffering from severe anemia, jaundice, and a severe gall bladder condition. The hospital had no blood bank and only a limited blood supply. The woman required a pint of blood a day if she was to live.

No call went out, no one requested any blood, but the word leaked back to the Bryce Canyon that someone needed help. True to their ship's motto, "Always ready," the crewmen literally rushed to the hospital and gave 11 pints of healthy blood.

Grateful for the blood donations, the doctors served, to the surprise and pleasure of the donors, two rounds of local Philippine Island beer stating: "Beer is the best medicine for rebuilding the red blood corpuscles."

The woman's condition is still uncertain, but the Filipino doctors believe she will live, and the men of the Bryce Canyon have given their stamp of approval to Filipino blood-building techniques.

This act, in its turn, was preceded only a few days by a visit of several officers and men of the Bryce Canyon to a nearby pigmy village to donate over 150 pounds of food to its people.

The pigmies, called Negritos in the Philippines, are a very poor people and make their livelihood selling bows and arrows as souvenirs in the town of Olongapo. In the days of old they were a savage headhunting tribe but civilization has slowly caught up with and passed them. They live in the hills near the Subic Bay Naval Base, in bamboo huts.

Among the food given the pigmies was dry milk. This was the first time the pigmies had seen milk of such a dry consistency but after shown how to mix the milk they expressed their amazement and gratitude for the food.

Meanwhile, being constructed aboard the Bryce Canyon is a giant flagpole for the Philippine Boy Scout camp at Manila, which will be the site of the World Boy Scout Jamboree beginning July 17.

These are but examples of the kind spirit of America exhibited by the many ships and many men of the U.S. Navy in many lands throughout the world. To them all, a grateful Nation says, "Well done, U.S. Navy."

State Taxation of Nonresidents

OF

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, April 20, 1959

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following statement which I made before the Senate subcommittee conducting hearings on the problems of State taxation of nonresidents:

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN RODINO ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS 29 AND 67 RELATING TO CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ON STATE TAXATION OF NONRESIDENTS

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the subcommittee for permitting me to make this statement concerning the problems covered by Senate Joint Resolutions 29 and 67 prohibiting or limiting the States in the taxing of incomes of nonresidents. Being a Representative in Congress from New Jersey, I am intimately and deeply concerned with this taxing problem. My own feeling in the matter results from the present discriminatory practice of New York in its taxation of New Jersey residents.

As you doubtless will recall, the legislature of New Jersey in 1957 adopted a resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 40, petitioning the Congress of the United States to adopt a constitutional amendment which would prohibit States from taxing the income of nonresidents. As a result of that petition, I sponsored in the 85th Congress House Joint Resolution 497. Simultaneously 12 bills similar to my own were introduced in Congress, principally from Members representing districts in the States of New Jersey and Connecticut. About a month after the legislature of New Jersey petitioned Congress, the State of Connecticut also petitioned the Congress (S.J. Res. 9) asking that the Congress convene a Constitutional Convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution to prohibit States from taxing the income of nonresidents.

At my request, the chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary caused a preliminary study to be made of the issues involved in this problem. A memorandum, containing the arguments pro and con, was prepared by one of the counsel of the House Committee on the Judiciary in collaboration with the American Law Section of the Library of Congress, and dated February 13, 1958—a year and 2 months ago—which I wish to submit for the subcommittee's record. (Document attached to end of statement.)

To my mind, the most effective way to deal with this problem of discriminatory taxation is a constitutional amendment eliminating the power. However, such a solution would be most difficult to accomplish since 31 States presently tax the in-State incomes of nonresidents and the membership of Congress from those States would be reluctant to go along with such legislation. In addition, the approach would require a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress and ratification by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. It is unlikely that the taxing States would ratify the proposed change.

Perhaps it is appropriate at this point to mention that the major concern of the 31 taxing States has not been whether nonresidents should be exempted or given equitable tax deductions but rather how best to protect their own residents from double taxation on out-of-State income.

The authority of a State to impose a taxation on income earned within the State by a nonresident was declared over 40 years ago by the decisions in Shaffer v. Carter (252 U.S. 37 (1920)) and Travis v. Yale and Towne Mfg. Co. (252 U.S. 60 (1920)).

Last year, after the preliminary studies were made, it seemed wiser, in view of the obstacles presented by the Constitutional amendment approach, to intensify efforts at the State level for the negotiation with New York for more equitable tax treatment of New Jersey residents.

Presently, a resident of New York may deduct from gross income such items as municipal taxes on his residence property, sales taxes, mortgage and personal loans, medical expenses within specified limits, premiums on hospitalization insurance, and gifts for charitable, religious and benevolent purposes.

A nonresident on the other hand may deduct from his taxable gross income in New York only an amount equal to 10 percent of such gross income or $500 whichever is less. While he may itemize his deductions, he may claim only those expenditures incurred in the production of income in New York, and such items as gifts to charitable, religious and benevolent corporations, if organized or operated under the laws of New York.

From an equitable point it seems to many of us that the nonresident taxpayer should be permitted to claim as deductions not only those expenses incurred arising in New York but also, on an apportionment basis, those deductions ordinarily allowed resident taxpayers.

In an effort to broaden deductions conferences were held among Governors Meyner of New Jersey, Harriman of New York, and Ribicoff of Connecticut.

Among other things, a Commission on Out-of-State Taxation of New Jersey Residents was created under Senate Concurrent Resolution 25 (1957) by the New Jersey Legislatures. Also, a study was made by Mr. Theodore Tannenwald, Jr. for Governor Harriman of New York in which he recommended enlarging certain deductions for out-of-State residents who must pay New York State taxes on personal income.

As disclosed in the newspapers of recent dates, New York did revise its tax laws but the only gain nonresidents received is a change in the flat sum they may claim in lieu of itemized deductions. Under New York's new law, this is raised from $500 to $1,000. The revision will not change the fact that the nonresident will pay considerably more tax than the resident with the same income, despite the fact that the nonresident is ineligible for many of that State's services.

According to latest figures, over 137,000 New Jersey residents working in New York are paying more than $20 million yearly to New York; Connecticut residents pay over 8 million.

When the 86th Congress convened in January, I reintroduced my bills. They are now designated House Joint Resolution 68 and H.R. 4174. House Joint Resolution 68 calls for a constitutional amendment; H.R. 4174 an interstate compact. To date, five methods have been suggested for dealing with the problem:

1. Constitutional amendment proposed by Congress, prohibiting State taxation of nonresident incomes.

2. Constitutional convention to prohibit State taxation of nonresident incomes.

3. An interstate compact permitting uniform tax treatment of all nonresidents through State agreement.

4. A national or uniform reciprocal law not to discriminate between residents and nonresidents in the levying and collection of taxes.

5. Federal preemption through the interstate commerce clause.

The first method enumerated above is the subject matter of the bills now before the subcommittee.

The State of Connecticut has asked for a constitutional convention under the second method of approach. This ostensibly could take the matter out of the hands of Congress and place it before a convention. However, there has not been a constitutional convention in the 169 years of our existence and, besides, 33 States must ask for it before one is in order.

So far as I know, the interstate compact approach was first suggested on June 3, 1958, at a hearing in Trenton, N.J., before the Commission on Out of State Taxation of New Jersey residents. In substance, the compact would grant the States the power to enter into agreements looking toward uniform tax treatment of nonresidents. It may be argued by some that such an approach is unnecessary since the States now have the power to enter into such agreements. While this is doubtless true, I nonetheless feel that a compact arrangement could have salutary effect because it would permit the States to make binding agreements containing penalty and other provisions. In the event of a breach of the agreement by one of the participating States, remedies, if it were so provided in the agreement, could be brought in our courts.

The fourth suggested approach concerns a national uniform law. As you know, we have many laws which are not Federal laws in the sense that they are enacted by Congress but are nevertheless national in scope in that they can affect all of the several States. Some of these laws are the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, the uniform extradition laws, and the uniform reciprocal enforcement of support laws. These laws come about by the drafting of so-called model acts which contain standard provisions and which are submitted to the States for adoption by the State legislatures and, of course, are binding on all States which adopt them. In the past such laws have been drafted by the Council of State Governments and by the American Law Institute. Certainly, it is within the realm of possibility that these organizations working singly or in conjunction with each other, and with agencies of the Federal Government and/or the Congress, could promulgate a model act for uniform tax treatment of nonresidents with strong enforcement provisions so that the States would be required to give full credence to its provisions.

The fifth suggestion, and one which in my opinion offers the best approach, is a Federal preemption law. Congress has plenary powers over interstate commerce. In some areas it exercises exclusive and absolute control; in others it shares concurrent jurisdiction with the States, and in still other areas it permits the States to occupy the field alone. It is my understanding that Congress under its interstate commerce power could deny to the States the right to tax the incomes of nonresidents where the organizations that employ them are engaged, either in whole or in part, in interstate commerce. It may be that the States should be denied this power of taxation absolutely. It may be that they should be denied it only in certain areas. I feel that this preemption approach merits serious study, looking toward Federal legislation which would restrict the States in this area of taxation so as to guarantee to nonresidents fair and equitable treatment.

As you know, the Supreme Court recently handed down a decision holding, in line with its decision some 40 years earlier, that States may tax the incomes of foreign corporations on activities within the taxing State which are exclusively in furtherance of interstate commerce. (Northwestern States Portland Cement Co. v. Minnesota.) I have been advised that the Senate Small Business Committee and the House Committee on the Judiciary, among others, have this decision under study.

Mr. Chairman, this problem is not confined to New York, New Jersey, or Connecticut or to any one region of the United States but is national in scope and effect. It affects all 49 States. It affects not only Minnesota in the northwestern part of our country, but it affects Georgia in the South. In recent months, newspapers have carried accounts of difficulties between Maryland and Virginia; Idaho and North Dakota have a similar problem. Pennsylvania and Delaware, as well as New Jersey and the city of Philadelphia, are also engaged in controversy concerning the taxation of nonresidents.

Mr. Chairman, the unfair and discriminatory actions now being imposed upon some of our citizens simply because their employment requires them to cross State lines must cease. If the States are unwilling to work the problem out at the State level through agreements, compacts, uniform laws, or otherwise, then the Federal Government, through its powers of preemption or by constitutional amendment, should bring about that which the States refuse or are incapable of accomplishing.

ARGUMENTS PRO AND CON ON PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT STATES FROM LEVYING INCOME TAXES ON NONRESIDENTS (H.J. RES. 497, 85TH CONG.)

PRO

In legal theory the income tax is considered to be a levy against the person, not against property or the process which creates the income. (Taxes (1955) 33: 375.) Being a personal tax it should be levied by the State of residence which provides protection and services to its inhabitants and to their property.

It is incorrect to contend that the nonresident receives the same benefits from the taxing State as do residents thereof. The nonresident does not avail himself of schools, hospitals, and kindred services that are afforded in the taxing State.

To require a nonresident to pay a contribution toward the expenses of a State in which he happens to earn money is to require him to pay something which in public policy and according to right and justice he does not owe.

It is also contrary to the theory of State income tax that a tax should be levied on nonresidents in respect of any income they derive from property owned or business conducted in the State which imposes said tax. The tax is justified as a payment for personal benefits which residents of a State derive from the government under which they are domiciled, and should not apply to nonresidents, who must be presumed to be taxed (and are taxed through various other forms of taxation) for such benefits in the State where they live. Any attempt to impose the tax upon income received by nonresidents from property situated, or business carried on, within the State changes the character of the tax and converts it into a payment, not for personal benefits derived by residents, but for benefits of a totally different nature such as business benefits, etc. These objections are not to be interpreted as meaning that a State cannot levy a tax for such benefits, but merely that it should not do so in the form of a personal income tax.

The contributions and services rendered by a multitude of nonresidents to the general business prosperty and productiveness of a State seeking to impose the income tax largely outweigh an expenses of police protection afforded by the latter State.

Only by adoption of a constitutional amendment will it be possible to end once and for all the inequities which result when the taxing State denies to nonresidents the same measure of deductions as it accords to residents. Litigation to remove this inequity having been unsuccessful, the proposed amendment alone can be depended upon to effect a much-needed reform (Charles Goodwin, Jr. v. New York State Tax Commission ((1955) 146 NYS 2d 172; (1956) 1. N.Y. 2d 680; appeal dismissed (1956) 352 U.S. 805)).

Thus a nonresident earning the same salary as a resident is denied the privilege extended to the latter of claiming deductions for sums contributed to his church, for taxes paid on his residence, for medical expenses or for premiums paid for hospitalization insurance, for interest accruing on mortgages or other evidences of indebtedness, or for capital losses incurred. The nonresident cannot take deductions for any of these outlays for the reason that they do not represent expenditures incurred in the taxing State or borne as part of the cost of earning income therein. As a consequence, a nonresident whose only source of income is his salary earned in the taxing State is compelled to pay a higher tax thereon than a resident of said State receiving the same amount of income.

The need for the proposed amendment is not avoided by suggesting that inequities resulting from the taxation of nonresidents can be eliminated by the uniform levy by all States of income taxes applicable to incomes of both nonresidents and residents. States whose citizens are unjustly treated by the tax laws of neighboring States are under no obligation to submit to dictation by the latter and to emulate the latter in the matter of tax legislation. Moreover, discrimination inflicted upon nonresidents by one State is not to be corrected by the adoption of retaliatory legislation by other States.

Justification of the proposed amendment is not refuted by contending that discriminatory State taxation of the income of nonresidents has been judicially sustained for almost 40 years. The Supreme Court expressed its approval of such practice at a time when State income taxes virtually were a rarity. Upon reconsideration of such discriminatory taxation today, the Court might well be expected to reach a result in harmony with the spirit of the proposed amendment.

By refusing to grant to nonresidents the same measure of deductions which they extend to their own inhabitants the States levying taxes on personal income in effect are erecting discriminatory barriers to the free movement of citizens across State lines which the framers of the Constitution sought to guarantee through the privileges and immunities clause of article 4 of the Constitution. Through discrimination in the measure of deductions, taxing States are making it impossible for out-of-State workers to obtain employment on the same terms of net remuneration as are available to their residents.

CON

Inasmuch as virtually all of the 31 States levying income taxes extend the same to nonresidents, the only beneficiaries of the proposed amendment will be the nonresidents from the minority of States which levy no taxes on personal income. No comparable benefit will accrue to residents of income tax States who work and earn their living in States levying no income tax; for such residents are taxed by the State of their domicile on their entire income from whatever source received.

The proposed amendment is contrary to the spirit of the privileges and immunities clause of article 4 of the Constitution; for it would confer on nonresident employees most of the privileges of residents but exempt them from obligations borne by the latter.

Nonresidents who enjoy the advantages of employment and the receipt of income within a State are morally as well as legally obligated to pay a quid pro quo in the form of a tax on income earned in such State.

In subjecting nonresidents to income taxes the States are applying the same rule as is contained in the Federal income tax law pursuant to which nonresident aliens and foreigners are taxed on income from sources within the United States.

The proposed amendment would adversely affect those States which, by reason of being highly industrialized or constituting financial centers, serve as a source of livelihood for thousands of out-of-State commuters.

Inasmuch as the principal grievance assigned in support of the proposed amendment arises not out of the levy of an income tax on nonresidents but from alleged inequities in the deductions available respectively to residents and nonresidents, it is clear that the remedy sought to be invoked is in excess of that required. Mere amendment of State income tax legislation is primarily needed and this can be achieved through negotiations at the State level, rather than by utilization of the difficult to obtain process of constitutional amendment.

Thus defenses offered in support of this amendment would be eliminated if States taxing the income of nonresidents would permit the latter to claim deductions in the same ratio as their income received in the taxing State bears to their total income received from all sources. Under this statutory change, nonresidents earning their entire income in the taxing State would be eligible to claim all of the deductions hitherto extended only to residents. Moreover, it has been estimated that the States effecting such amendment of their income tax laws would suffer no appreciable loss of revenue.

The taxing States do not levy, as they do in the case of their own residents, on the entire income of nonresidents. It is, therefore, entirely appropriate and equitable for these States to withhold from nonresidents the same measure of deductions as are accorded to residents. The validity of this distinction in the measure of deductions granted has been upheld by the courts (Chas. Goodwin, Jr. v. New York State Tax Commission ((1955) 146 N.Y.S. 2d 172; (1956) 1 N.Y. 2d 680; appeals dismissed (1956) 352 U.S. 805)).

If State A imposes no tax on the income of its own residents, why should the latter, who carry on their business or earn their livelihood in State B in competition with citizens of State B, be exempt from taxation on income by State B? To erect such exemption into a general rule would result not only to the disadvantage of citizens of State B but would encourage every citizen of State B who desired to escape taxes to transfer his legal residence to a country home in State A.

Irrespective of his place of domicile the owner of income-producing property or the recipient of income within a State has the right to call upon the government of that State for protection of his rights. Accordingly, he is under a corresponding obligation to pay taxes, including income taxes, to defray the cost of such protection.

In seeking to recover revenues lost by adoption of the proposed amendment States might be encouraged to levy novel taxes on business establishments which would have the effect of discouraging them from hiring out-of-State employees.

Of the 31 States levying taxes on personal income all but 2 grant their residents a credit for taxes levied on them as nonresidents by other States. Hence the burden alleged to be produced by multiple taxation is grossly exaggerated.

For almost 40 years collection of State income taxes from nonresidents has been sustained as constitutional (Travis v. Yale and Towne Mfg. Co. (1920) 252 U.S. 60)). The proposed amendment thus would overturn a mode of taxation that has met the test of time.

SENATE

TUESDAY, APRIL 21, 1959

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, with soiled face and hands unclean with the dust of earthly toil, in this moment of communion with the unseen, we would come to the crystal waters of Thy restoring grace.

As those set aside to prescribe for the ills of an ailing social order, we pray that Thou will first cleanse our own souls from moral pollution and mental darkness.

In a world where the worst wars constantly against the best, open our eyes to invisible allies which fight by the side of those who keep step with the drumbeat of Thy will—invincible forces which at last will bend and break the spears of evil.

When the sadness of the world creeps into our own eyes, and we are plagued with our own inadequacy for these violent times which try and test our souls, stand Thou in splendor before us like the light, like love all lovely, like the morning which slays the shadows.

We ask it in the name of that One whose life is the light of the world. Amen.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS OF SOUTH CAROLINA LEGISLATURE

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], and myself, I present two concurrent resolutions of the South Carolina Legislature. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolutions were received, appropriately referred, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Armed Services:

"CONCURRENT RESOLUTION PROTESTING ANY REDUCTION IN THE STRENGTH OF THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES AND ALSO PROTESTING ANY APPEASEMENT OF THE RUSSIANS BY THE UNITED STATES LEADING TO THE WITHDRAWAL OF OUR FORCES FROM WEST BERLIN

"Whereas it is the sense of this body that U.S. Government is contemplating a reduction in the U.S. Army of one division, a reduction in the combat strength of the U.S. Marine Corps of 12½ percent, and also reduction in the strength of the U.S. Navy and the U.S. Air Force; and

"Whereas it is the sense of this body that such reductions would seriously imperil the national security of the United States, particularly in view of the Soviet deadline of May 27 for withdrawal of our Armed Forces from West Berlin: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives, the senate concurring, That this body is unalterably opposed to any further reduction in the Armed Forces of the United States at the present time. It is the belief of this body that the people of South Carolina and of the United States do not favor appeasement of the Russians in any manner whatsoever, particularly in regard to any appeasement which would lead to Soviet control of West Berlin; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Members of the congressional delegation of the State of South Carolina, to the President, the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense of the United States of America."

State of South Carolina, in the house of representatives, Columbia, S.C., April 17, 1959.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the South Carolina House of Representatives and concurred in by the senate.

INEZ WATSON,
Clerk of the House.

To the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"CONCURRENT RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE CONGRESS AND PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TO SAFEGUARD AND PRESERVE ESTABLISHED STATE AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS TO THE USE OF WATER WITHIN THE SEPARATE STATES

"Whereas recent decisions from the Federal courts and recent rulings from the U.S. Department of Justice have deprived States, and persons, of rights which the States and persons previously enjoyed in regulating and controlling the use of the water in the respective States; and

"Whereas these decisions and rulings are a part of a general pattern developing gradually into Federal supremacy and usurpation over water which, if continued, will destroy individual and States' rights over water and substitute in lieu thereof an all-powerful centralized government control: Now therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives, the senate concurring, That the President and the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, urged and requested to take all necessary action: (1) Preserve the water rights of the individual and of the States and prevent Federal usurpation of those rights; (2) see that legislation is initiated and supported to return to the individuals and to the States the rights taken from them by the Federal courts and the Justice Department; and (3) in every way possible reaffirm, renew, and defend the concepts that water rights are property rights and that these established rights, to the use of water, by a State and an individual, should not be taken away without due process of law and adequate compensation; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of the above be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress, chairman of the U.S. Senate and House Committees of Interior and Insular Affairs, U.S. Senator OLIN D. JOHNSTON, U.S. Senator J. STROM THURMOND, U.S. Representative WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORN, U.S. Representative ROBERT T. ASHMORE, U.S. Representative ROBERT W. HEMPHILL, U.S. Representative JOHN L. MCMILLAN, U.S. Representative L. MENDEL RIVERS, and U.S. Representative JOHN J. RILEY."

State of South Carolina, in the house of representatives, Columbia, S.C., April 17, 1959.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the South Carolina house of representatives and concurred in by the senate.

[SEAL] INEZ WATSON,
Clerk of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

JOINT RESOLUTION OF OREGON LEGISLATURE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the Honorable Robert B. Duncan, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, in which he advises me he has the honor to transmit House Joint Memorial 7, urging that efforts be made toward the enactment of legislation by Congress to aid in the construction of a suitable Champoeg Memorial by the National Park Service and the maintenance of the same as a national monument.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Memorial 7 of the Oregon Legislature be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENROLLED HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 7

To the Honorable Fred A. Seaton, Secretary of the Interior, and the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

"Whereas at Champoeg, Oreg., on the bank of the Willamette River, the State of Oregon now has a small tract of land purchased as a nucleus of a memorial to the pioneers who established at that spot the first orderly government in what is now the State of Oregon, a memorial that should become the shrine of the great northwest territory which was then embraced within the Oregon country, such territory embracing what now constitutes the present States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, and that part of the States of Montana and Wyoming lying west of the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and containing over 300,000 square miles; and

"Whereas in 1929 the Oregon Legislature passed Senate Joint Resolution 24 memorializing the Congress to establish Champoeg as a national shrine, and the Advisory Board to the National Park Service in response thereto made a report in 1939 declaring that Champoeg possessed exceptional value as commemorating and illustrating the history of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior thereupon designated Champoeg Park as a site of national historical significance: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, the Senate jointly concurring therein, That the people of the State of Oregon approve this recognition by the Federal Government of the importance of Champoeg and urge upon their Senators and Representatives and the Secretary of the Interior that efforts be made toward the enactment of legislation by Congress to aid in the construction of a suitable Champoeg memorial by the National Park Service and the maintenance of the same as a national monument; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior and to all Members of the Oregon congressional delegation."

Adopted by house March 27, 1959.

RUTH E. RENFROE,
Chief Clerk of House.
ROBERT B. DUNCAN,
Speaker of House.

Adopted by senate April 3, 1959.

WALTER J. PEARSON,
President of Senate.

(See the above resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. JAVITS, which appears under a separate heading.)

ARCHIE L. DICKSON, JR.—REFERENCE OF BILL TO COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. EASTLAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 107); which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1651) entitled "A bill for the relief of Archie L. Dickson, Jr.," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, is hereby referred to the Court of Claims; and the court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28 of the United States Code and report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, giving such findings of fact and conclusions thereon as shall be sufficient to inform the Congress of the nature and character of the demand as a claim, legal or equitable, against the United States and the amount, if any, legally or equitable due from the United States to the claimant.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1949, RELATING TO RESTRICTIONS ON SALES BY COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which in my opinion will assist in bringing to the farmer a better price for the crops which he raises and can sell on the open market.

This bill will raise the percent from 5 percent to 15 percent above the support price at which the Commodity Credit Corporation must sell the basic agriculture products which they have in storage. In my opinion this will provide more room for the traders to operate in and will result in their buying more of the basic products on the open market at better prices. This should create a more competitive market for farm products thus bringing increased income to the farmer.

It should also reduce substantially the amount of basic agriculture crops which the Commodity Credit Corporation now takes under its loan program. This—in turn—should result in a considerable savings of the taxpayers money now being used for storage rentals.

I hope this proposed legislation will receive early consideration in the committee and the Senate so that it can become effective before harvest time 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1761) to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421) with respect to restrictions on sales by the Commodity Credit Corporation, introduced by Mr. MUNDT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

USE OF SURPLUS FEDERAL PROPERTY BY PUBLIC RECREATION AGENCIES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to permit the use of surplus Federal property by public recreation agencies.

Pennsylvania has a park expansion program which has attracted nationwide attention. There are 66 State parks now in operation. Five more are under construction, and several more are on the drawing boards. Particular emphasis is being placed on constructing new parks near the State's population centers. We have the second most heavily used State park system in the Nation, second only to New York, and we have 148 State forest recreation areas, a number second only to Oregon.

In carrying out this remarkable program, the opportunity to obtain surplus Federal property would be extremely helpful. Under the Clarke-McNary Act, we have authority to obtain such equipment for our fire-fighting activities, which protect 15 million acres of forest. The bill which I am introducing today would extend this authority to equipment for other recreational purposes, and would mean much to carrying out our park expansion program with all possible speed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1766) to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation and other disposal of property to tax-supported public recreation agencies, introduced by Mr. CLARK, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

STUDY OF PRIVATE INVESTMENT OF AMERICAN CAPITAL ABROAD

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I submit, for appropriate reference, a resolution providing for an investigation of the consequences of the investment of American private capital abroad.

This would be an investigation recognizing the many massive values of the investment of American capital abroad, but determined to get the facts of some of the very grave problems it provokes.

Frankly, this investigation has been inspired by a series of recent reports that there have been heavy and substantially increasing purchases by American companies of foreign plants. In at least two industries vital to employment in my State—machine tools and tractors—American companies have recently in effect transferred part of their production from Wisconsin to foreign countries. Obviously this means that jobs formerly held by Wisconsin workingmen are now held by working people in other countries. In the case of a single Wisconsin company it seems that the 40 percent of production that used to go into export is now being produced in a foreign factory, with a loss of more than 2,000 Wisconsin jobs.

Although recently about 75,000 people have been out of work in Wisconsin, our unemployment problem has been less serious than that in some other States.

But, Mr. President, reliable reports indicate that this export of American jobs has just begun. The combination of available American capital, American automation and know-how, fused with lower foreign wages, is not only cutting a terrible swath in the export market for American factories; it is beginning to cost them some of their domestic U.S. markets.

I recognize, Mr. President, that there is much to be said in favor of investment of American private capital abroad. It is to the great interest of America, and indeed the free world, to assist the other countries of the free world to grow stronger economically. Unquestionably this investment is accomplishing that objective. It is doing so at no cost to the American taxpayer. And to date the cost of building up the economies of our friends throughout the world by Government appropriations has been immensely costly in American taxes, and promises to continue to be for some time in the future. Just as I favor Government loans to foreign countries over grants, I emphatically prefer private capital investment to Government investment. It is more efficient. It is subject to the iron discipline of the profit system, so it will not be wasteful.

Mr. President, this is exactly the kind of clash between competing values and interests that can best be settled by getting all the facts. Congress should find a way to encourage private American investment abroad while providing some kind of proper safeguards for American jobs.

It is for this reason, Mr. President, I today propose a Senate investigation of the full consequences of the investment of American capital abroad. Because this is an inquiry that might very seriously affect our monetary policy as well as our tax, tariff, labor, regulatory, and foreign policies, I have proposed that the Banking and Currency Committee conduct the investigation.

Mr. President, a number of exceedingly thoughtful reports and analyses have been made on this situation. The Wall Street Journal has carried two unusually comprehensive stories; one featured the machine tool industry and one tractors. Both of these articles do a first class job of setting forth the burdens and benefits of this development, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD following my remarks. One is from the March 17 issue; the second appeared just last Monday, April 20.

(See exhibits 1 and 2.)

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a recent article in the Foreign Commerce Weekly shows how American companies have been setting themselves up inside the European Common Market in growing numbers; and I ask unanimous consent that appropriate excerpts from this article be printed in the RECORD following my remarks also.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the April 6 issue of the Washington Post, Harold Dorsey writes an excellent, compact analysis of this problem, and I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD. A March 26 lead editorial in the Wall Street Journal vigorously expresses the viewpoint that this trend to invest American capital abroad emphasizes the importance of price stability in America. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial also be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

(See exhibits 4 and 5.)

MACHINE TOOL TACTICS—MORE MAKERS BUY INTO FOREIGN FIRMS AS HIGH PRICES SLOW THEIR SALES—OTHER U.S. PRODUCERS AGREE TO IMPORT EUROPEAN TOOLS; COMMON MARKET IS A SPUR—AUTO, AIR FORCE BUYING LAGS

(By Harlan Byrne)

Sundstrand Machine Tool Co., of Rockford, Ill., soon will anounce purchase of a controlling interest in a French tool company. The French firm will be expanded to turn out Sundstrand tools for the European market.

Later this month, a freighter bearing 50 English-made engine lathes, a basic machine tool, will dock in New York City. Oddly enough, the shipment, worth about $300,000, will be addressed to an American firm that also makes lathes. The firm—Clearing Machine Corp., of Chicago, a division of U.S. Industries, Inc.—will sell the English lathes in this country and expects to import many more.

These divergent moves have one thing in common. They're both symptomatic of the growing inability of U.S. machine tools—and many other manufactured goods, for that matter—to compete pricewise with foreign-made products. A major reason is fairly well known: Labor costs in the United States are higher—they're two to four times those of Europe, the area providing the tool makers' heaviest competition.

Several industries, such as textiles and electrical equipment, have been complaining of growing competition from imports for years. But imports' impact more recently has been spreading to automobiles, steel, and a number of other industries. Ernest R. Breech, chairman of Ford Motor Co., recently declared that swift industrial development and cost advantages in foreign countries are threatening both the oversea and domestic markets of American industry.

COMMON MARKETS IMPACT

Machine tool builders are losing ground steadily in foreign markets—so far a mere foretaste of a drastic setback they foresee in a few years. The European Common Market, for instance, is a major worry. The market nations—France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, The Netherlands, and Luxembourg—plan progressively to eliminate tariff barriers among themselves, but to maintain a common tariff front against other nations. This will make it easier for West Germany to sell machine tools in France, for instance, but relatively more difficult for a U.S. firm to do so.

Growing numbers of American firms are trying to regain lost business, and to head off future losses, by producing machine tools abroad, either by purchasing foreign companies or by setting up new plants overseas.

"There are so many Americans running around over there, the sale prices on European firms are going sky-high," grumbles one Ohio machine-tool maker. So far, he has resisted the urge to go deeply into overseas manufacturing. Reportedly, one U.S. company recently backed away from an acquisition in Europe because of the high asking price.

Meantime, imported tools flowing into the United States account for a growing share of domestic sales. Often, they undersell U.S. machines by 25 percent to 40 percent. For example, one type of small American lathe, without electrical apparatus, carries a list price of $5,145. It faces competition from a comparable English lathe that sells in this country for about $3,600.

EIGHT THOUSAND DOLLARS VERSUS ELEVEN THOUSAND DOLLARS

Francis J. Trecker, president of Kearney & Trecker Corp. of Milwaukee, says a small-size West German milling machine is coming into the United States for $8,000, compared with $11,000-or-so for its American counterpart. The competition is equally severe for American tools selling in foreign markets.

Some toolmen loudly complain the rising tide of imports ultimately will cripple American machine tool building capacity. The National Machine Tool Builders Association even now is gathering data for a possible drive in Washington for higher tariffs, a stronger "Buy America" Act or both.

Present tariffs have little effect on imports; the 25 percent to 40 percent price advantage enjoyed by foreign tools takes into account current tariffs, which average about 15 percent. The Buy American Act as it now stands provides that the Government, in buying for its own needs, must purchase U.S.-produced goods if the price of the domestic product is no more than 6 percent above the price of a comparable import. This act obviously is of little help to U.S. machine-tool builders now.

U.S. machine-tool builders, however, are not of one mind on tariffs. Some of the bigger companies, as they push into foreign operations themselves, are tending more and more toward freer trade. But most of the U.S. firms are relatively small and have neither the inclination nor the funds to get into overseas production; this group tends to be highly protectionist.

Especially alarming to this group is talk—to date that's all it is—that American producers setting up shop abroad before long may begin selling in this country the tools they make overseas.

"We would do that only as a last resort," claims an executive of one Cincinnati tool builder which recently completed a new plant in England. Executives of other tool firms involved in foreign manufacturing say they have no such plans, but infer it could happen later. Another Ohioan, whose firm manufactures tools abroad, but has no intention of shipping any back to the United States, says privately, "It will be a sad day for the machine-tool industry when American firms start selling their own foreign-made tools in the United States." But such sentiments aren't stopping toolmakers from importing products of foreign firms.

The U.S. toolmakers' price problem has been growing in the past decade, the average price of American-made tools has doubled.

"It looks as if we're pricing ourselves out of world markets," says Donald H. McIver, vice president of Detroit's Ex-Cell-O Corp. It's a comment being heard over and over nowadays.

True, the trade woes of machine tool men are not unique, as executives in such major fields as steel, electrical equipment, and textiles will testify. But in few basic industries is the trouble more acute. It's especially painful now because tool demand in this country, overall, is less than half what it was at peacetime high 3 years ago. And domestic prospects are far from bright at the moment.

While most industries have begun to climb out of the recession, machine tool demand has risen only slightly in recent months, following a 2-year-long tumble. The industry is shipping tools now at only about 30 percent of capacity.

To be sure, the industry is relatively small in comparison with autos or steel, having a capacity to turn out about $1.2 billion of tools annually. But it's a key industry, for machine tools are the muscles of manufacturing. Just about every product involves the use of a machine tool in its manufacture or delivery.

For instance, they make the working parts of household conveniences such as the telephone, television, radio, washing machine, refrigerator, and vacuum cleaner. Autos, locomotives, airplanes, and missiles require machine tools. On factory production lines, these power-driven tools, in a variety of types, perform basic metal cutting and shaping tasks—boring, grinding, turning, milling, planing, shearing, or stamping away at raw metal.

A few statistics show the impact of foreign competition. Prior to World War II, imports were insignificant. Five years ago, they were less than 3 percent of domestic shipments, after deducting exports. In 1958, they rose to nearly 7 percent and the ratio is expected to rise henceforth.

DOLLAR VOLUME DECLINES

Actually, dollar volume of imports last year declined to an estimated $30 million, from around $37 million in 1957, but the drop was less than 20 percent, compared with a slump of more than 50 percent in domestic shipments, from $972 million to $447 million.

The record year for imports was 1952, when pellmell Korean war buying brought on shortages, attracting a $49 million flood of foreign tools. "Tool buyers took anything they could get their hands on in those days," recalls Ludlow King, executive vice president of the National Machine Tool Builders Association in Cleveland. But by 1955, imports had slipped back to $16 million. They jumped 50 percent both in 1956 and 1957.

Before World War II and in the early postwar years, U.S. toolmen on the average rang up about 25 percent of their total sales in the export market. In recent years, exports have dwindled to about 10 percent of the total, and further erosion is expected. For some companies, exports have nearly evaporated.

Mr. Trecker says that in the late 1930's around 40 percent of Kearney & Trecker's volume was exports, compared with around 2 percent or 3 percent now. "It's getting to be absolutely impossible to sell in foreign markets unless you have a foreign plant," he says.

"As recently as 10 years ago, about one-fourth of our volume was exports," relates K. M. Allen, executive vice president of Rockford Machine Tool Co. "Now it's down to 5 percent or less." Mr. Allen is one of the Yanks who recently has been touring Europe, not merely to see the sights. "We're not big enough to build our own plant, but we would like to buy a controlling interest in a small firm," he says.

TOP PAY: 70 CENTS AN HOUR

In England, Mr. Allen was "amazed" to find the top pay for machinists in a new American-owned plant was 70 cents an hour, compared with an average of about $2.60 or more in the United States. "You can buy iron in England for 8½ cents a pound, compared with 20 cents here," he adds.

Manufacture of American tools abroad is not new, of course. For years, a number of U.S. companies have had some of their tool lines made in Europe, through licensees. And a handful of firms, such as Cincinnati Milling Machine Co. and the La Pointe Machine Tool Co. of Hudson, Mass., have had their own overseas plants. But by U.S. standards the plants were small. Within the past 3 years, American tool men have stepped up overseas manufacturing. They've either expanded or built their own plants, or bought into existing firms.

Item: Last July, Kearney & Trecker acquired a controlling interest in a big English firm, C.V.A. Jigs, Moulds & Tools, Ltd. The English firm presently employs 2,300, while Kearney & Trecker, ironically, is down to 1,300 workers, from 3,000 about 2 years ago.

Item: Ex-Cell-O recently broke ground near Eislingen, West Germany, for a new machine-tool plant. The new plant will house expanded operations of a firm acquired last September. The company was Werkzeugmaschinenfabrik Geoppingen G.M.B.H., a maker of lathes and planers. The name has been changed to Ex-Cell-O G.M.B.H. "Higher costs forced us overseas," is the laconic explanation of Mr. McIver, the Ex-Cell-O vice president.

Item: Landis Tool Co., of Waynesboro, Pa., last fall bought out John Lund Co., Ltd., of Keighley, England.

Item: Last year, 126-year-old Brown & Sharpe Manufacturing Co., Providence, R.I., put in operation a new plant in Plymouth, England. "During many years before the war, exports were as much as 30 percent of our business," recalls Henry S. Sharpe, Jr., president. "Now they're below 10 percent. You have to make many of your tools abroad nowadays if you're going to be represented in foreign markets."

Item: Cincinnati Milling 2 years ago expanded its English plant and now ponders expansion of its 4-year-old plant in Holland. And other U.S. toolmakers reportedly will be announcing foreign ventures this year.

JOINING FORCES

In addition, more and more firms are looking for tieups to sell and manufacture foreign tools in this country. Most imported tools are sold through established U.S. distributors, who usually handle a number of American lines, too. But, more and more, the toolmakers themselves are joining forces with foreigners.

The import agreement made by Clearing Machine Corp. appears to be precedent-setting in size and portent.

Clearing Machine signed the sales pact with T. S. Harrison & Sons, Ltd., Heckmondwike, England. The Harrison lathes will be sold in the United States and Mexico by Clearing's sales staff, for a percentage of the selling price. The lathes are smaller than the ones made by Clearing. In short, the Chicago firm decided the easiest way to expand its line was to sell the Harrison lathes.

"We think this deal will shake some of our buddies in the machine tool business down to their heels," comments a spokesman. "Actually, it should start a trend. We think a lot of people have been waiting around for an American tool builder to break the ice." The spokesman plainly leaves the impression the firm expects to push the imported tools vigorously.

For the future, significantly, Clearing and Harrison are planning to team up on new designs for machine tools. The newer tools would be built in England and shipped into the United States.

Another midwestern tool executive concedes his firm may be forced into a similar transaction. "Unless our business improves a lot, we may have to line up with a foreign firm on an import deal," he says. H. Ezra Eberhardt, chairman of Gould & Eberhardt, Inc., Irvington, N.J., says his firm soon will announce an agreement involving a foreign tool linkup, although he declines to specify whether it will be an import or export arrangement.

Regarding the Clearing-Harrison alliance, still another Midwesterner comments: "It's wrong, as far as I'm concerned, for a domestic builder to import the products of a foreign builder."

In various types of recent agreements, several small U.S. firms have arranged to make or sell foreign tools in this country. In most cases, however, the number of tools involved so far is small. The companies include Fellows Gear Shaper Co., Springfield, Vt., and Cone Automatic Machine Co., Inc., Windsor, Vt.

Fortunately for the big majority of U.S. tool companies, imports so far have been concentrated heavily in a few lines of tools. Chiefly, imports have been small sizes of engine lathes, radial drills, shapers, and milling and grinding machines. In 1957, for example, lathes accounted for more than 20 percent of total imports.

THE LARGER LINES

In the larger, more complicated tool lines, American machines still are preferred because of higher and more accurate production capability, it's generally acknowledged. This includes the types of high speed tools that are used in mass production of major automotive components, such as engine blocks and transmission housings. But the Europeans have been narrowing the technical gap on larger tools in recent years, American producers concede. And more competition is implied for the future.

World War II, of course, destroyed much of the prewar European machine tool capacity, particularly in Germany. After the war, European tool men were pressed to meet demand in their own countries. U.S. firms stepped in to fill many of these needs, just as they had done extensively before the war. But as Europeans have recovered from the war and expanded, they've gained a clear-cut advantage, largely because of the cost-price upswing in this country.

There's no question the foreign trade pinch would be less painful if domestic demand were more robust. At the moment, the majority of U.S. tool executives can see little more than a modest recovery for the remainder of this year.

To see what's happened, take a close look at statistics of the National Machine Tool Builders Association, covering the metal cutting segment of the industry. The other segment is metal forming. But statistics on the forming end of the business have been compiled for only 2 years.

Beginning in the last half of 1955 and extending through the early part of 1957, incoming orders for metal-cutting tools rolled in at a record peacetime rate. Orders totaled $927 million for the year 1955, followed by $924 million in 1956. The following year they fell to $520 million. Last year they plunged to around $281 million, the lowest since 1949. Many companies report their incoming orders in 1958 were the lowest since before World War II.

COMING FROM LOW LEVEL

For 1959, the majority of toolmen see little more than a 25-percent gain in new orders. And while 25 percent sounds like a big gain, it's coming from a low level.

"If you're operating at only 25 percent of capacity and have a 50-percent stepup, for example, you still would be operating only at 37½ percent of capacity," comments an officer of Giddings & Lewis Machine Tool Co., Fond du Lac, Wis.

Why the slow recovery? There are a number of reasons. For example, in late 1955 and early 1956, the auto companies went on a tool-buying spree. Reportedly they placed close to $500 million in new orders in a 6-month period.

The auto companies now are buying new tools in comparatively small volume. "Detroit is dead compared with 3 years ago," observes one Illinois toolbuilder. One reason: The auto companies in the past year have resorted increasingly to rebuilding of older tools to meet some of their requirements for new production facilities.

Toolmen say that the big majority of retooling done by General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., and Chrysler Corp. for the new small cars has consisted of rebuilding older machines. The auto companies either do the work themselves or, more often, give the business to a machine-tool company at half or less the price of a comparable new tool.

AIR FORCE CUTS BUYING

Also, during the tool-buying spree of 1955 and 1956, the Air Force was a big buyer of large machines for turning out aircraft components. In early 1955 and 1956, the Air Force placed something like $150 million of orders, it is estimated. But now the Air Force is buying few tools. Missiles are replacing aircraft. Production still is relatively low and requires more metal fabrication than it does metal cutting and forming, for example.

Other metalworking manufacturers generally were buying tools for expansion at a fast pace in 1955 and 1956. Now they have excess capacity. There's no evidence yet that manufacturers generally will embark on another major round of expansion—and thus tool buying—before 1960.

"Recovery in the machine-tool business has a long way to go," sums up Frederick V. Geier, Cincinnati Milling Machine chairman.

TRAVELING TRACTORS—PRODUCERS SPUR IMPORTS FROM THEIR FOREIGN PLANTS, CITE SAVINGS—HARVESTER GETS FIRST UNITS—OLIVER SEEKS FOREIGN TIE—CASE EXPANDS IN FRANCE—THE UAW STARTS TO WORRY

(By John F. Lawrence)

At a pier in Jacksonville, a crew of husky Negro stevedores was busy a few days ago unloading a shipment of bright red farm tractors from the hold of the British freighter, Manchester Merchant.

This work scene in the warm Florida sunshine went practically unnoticed. The shipment was small—only 12 tractors. And the big farm equipment factories in the North were busy with their own affairs turning out a heavy flow of equipment for farm needs this summer.

These 12 tractors, however, have a special significance. They are the first farm machines that International Harvester Co., the world's largest maker of such equipment, has imported from abroad. The company will bring in 300 more between now and summer—all made in Harvester's factories overseas. And that's just the start, company officials predict.

A GROWING CROWD

Harvester is not alone in this endeavor. Ford Motor Co.'s tractor division and Massey-Ferguson, Ltd., of Toronto already are active importers. And now three other major farm equipment companies are considering similar steps. J. I. Case Co., the big Racine, Wis., producer, probably will be next to take the plunge. Both Oliver Corp., of Chicago, and Minneapolis-Moline Co., Minneapolis, have executives abroad scouting the prospects.

It's a quiet trend, so far; total imports last year were only $23 million, compared to total U.S. production of farm equipment of $1.5 billion. But it holds dramatic possibilities, particularly for American farmers who might expect to gain some of the purchasing economies from low-cost European tractor production that buyers of small foreign cars now enjoy.

Already, a few farmers are beginning to gloat over the bargains they've gotten. "I figure I saved about $1,000 over U.S.-made models," says Paul H. Betts of Kewanee, Ill., who bought a $3,100 imported Fordson tractor a while back.

SOME WILL LOSE

The import possibilities aren't nearly as pleasant for the 100,000 workers in America's farm equipment factories. Imports last year were up 77 percent from 1957 and were nearly six times as large as in 1952. It is estimated that 1,500 more men would have been needed in factories here if the machinery imported in 1958 had been produced in the United States.

"It's the company's (International Harvester) obligation to keep all the employment in this country it can," snaps Tony D'Allesandro, president of United Auto Workers' Local 1307 at Harvester's big West Pullman tractor parts plant in Chicago. His chief, UAW Vice President Duane "Pat" Greathouse, talks of the need of a "comprehensive study of the import problem" and mentions tariffs as a possibility. (Farm equipment now comes in duty free.)

Much lower labor costs abroad, of course, provide the main impetus for the import surge. Hourly wage rates in European farm machinery factories are as much as 74 percent below those here. Harvester, for example, pays 82 cents an hour in Great Britain, 67 cents in Germany, and 64 cents in France. It pays $2.59 in the United States. In addition, Harvester's British employees work a 44-hour week compared with the standard American 40-hour week. Harvester says fringe benefits also are lower at its foreign plants.

EFFECTS ON SUPPLIERS

For American companies with factories abroad, any increase in imported farm machinery will probably consist of shifting orders and production from one plant to another. But the impact on companies without extensive foreign operations may be much more severe. Also, there is the possibility of less business for U.S. producers of steel, castings, paint, and the dozens of other components which go into farm tool assemblies.

The tractors being brought in this year by American companies are not directly competitive with U.S. models, being either smaller or larger than their American counterparts, much as General Motors Vauxhalls and Opels have little similarity to Pontiacs and Buicks. But if the expected economies of foreign production prove out, there is nothing to prevent the European factories of U.S. companies from switching to tractor models identical with those now being made in the United States. At the present stage, in fact, tractor imports bear a marked similarity to the foreign-car situation of 5 years ago, when import volume was only about 30,000 cars a year. Since then car imports have gained substantially every year and are expected to reach nearly 500,000—hardly a reassuring comparison for America firsters in the tractor business.

International Harvester's plan of operation is to concentrate on selling its imported tractors in the Southeast at first and then broaden the program to other parts of the country. Tractors probably won't be the only machines involved. "I think you'll see other items coming in," says Mark V. Keeler, farm-equipment vice president. Already plans are being considered for hay balers from the company's French plant and grain planters from its Swedish factory.

J. I. Case's energetic president, Marc B. Rojtman, says: "There's a strong possibility we'll import a small diesel tractor; we'll certainly make the decision by yearend." Case is boosting the annual capacity of its French plant to 12,000 units from 5,000, partly to take care of this possible export volume to the United States. This will double the French factory's current 1,100 employment. Case's payroll in the United States at the moment is about 14,000, in comparison.

Ford started importing tractors in 1953 with a large diesel model manufactured in the firm's English factory. Late last year Ford began bringing in a second diesel model, smaller than the original. It expects its imports, as a result, to climb from the 2,860 units brought in last year.

Oliver Corp. is studying the possibilities of a joint venture with a foreign firm to produce Oliver equipment for import into the United States. Minneapolis-Moline, on the other hand, is involved in a search for low-priced foreign component parts. "We've studied world purchasing for 4 years, but we're just now getting serious," says M-M's president, J. Russell Duncan.

Canadian-based Massey-Ferguson and its major U.S. subsidiary, Massey-Ferguson, Inc., in Racine, probably are furthest along in international procurement practices. "We're working toward a worldwide network of integrated manufacturing facilities that will enable us to produce whatever we need wherever we can do it most economically," explains Albert A. Thornbrough, president, from his Toronto office.

Example: The company buys a transmission from its plant in France and a rear axle from one in England for a tractor it turns out in Detroit.

TWO ABSTAINERS

Of the Nation's eight major producers, accounting for 60 percent of domestic sales of machinery to farmers, only Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., Milwaukee, and Deere & Co., in Moline Ill., insist they aren't giving any consideration to importing farm equipment. But Deere which with Harvester sits atop the heap in U.S. sales, is expanding a 2-year-old German operation. It denies intentions of aiming shipments this way but one outside company supplier insists, "I'll give you odds that's part of their purpose."

Even small implement makers are interested. The head of one Missouri concern reports he's already buying 40 percent of his heavy chain needs, used in the tractor hitches on implements, in West Germany. And he confides, "I'm working on a deal to make a license arrangement with a foreign firm to sell my equipment overseas." He could, if competition forced it, turn to importing his own products from this foreign concern, he says.

There's evidence, too, of increased competition from machinery bearing truly foreign trademarks. David Brown, Ltd., of London has sold about 200 tractors through a west coast distributor in the last 5 years. Now it plans to step up sales efforts. The distributor, Tap Equipment Co., of Los Angeles, plans to increase total dealerships in four Far Western States to 50 from a current 15 by yearend.

What sort of savings are possible with foreign production? Harvester figures its imported diesel tractor, priced at $2,802, would cost U.S. farmers as much as $3,350 if it were made here, assuming the tooling were available.

"We pay more for tires overseas," says Jack L. Camp, Harvester vice president of foreign operations, "and there's little overall savings in other materials. The difference is all in wages." There is less automatic machinery in the company's English plant, so 14 percent more manhours of labors are needed for each tractor, but, even at that, total labor cost per unit is about 60 percent less than in the United States. It costs roughly $150 each to ship the tractors across the Atlantic.

EVEN LARGER SAVINGS

Cost advantages of the French hay baler which the company may introduce here look even more promising; $600 vs. $1,800 (after tooling up expenses in the United States).

Because of high gasoline costs in Europe, diesel-powered equipment is about all that is sold farmers there. This produces high volume—and low costs—on diesel engine parts in which U.S. manufacturers are increasingly interested. Minneapolis-Moline, looking for fuel pumping mechanisms for its domestic diesel tractors, thinks it can achieve savings of 30 percent under U.S. prices by buying abroad.

But price alone isn't the reason for the American companies' increasing stake in European production. Since the devastation of World War II, the market for farm machines abroad has increased year by year. U.S. companies have supplied this growing market both by exporting from American factories and setting up new factories abroad. Recently, export volume has been slipping: From $516 million in 1956, to $510 million in 1957 and $435 million last year. But sales from U.S. plants overseas have more than made up for this loss.

AN UNBROKEN RECORD

"We haven't missed once in the last decade in recording a 5 percent annual gain in overall foreign operations, despite the drop in the export portion," enthuses Harvester's Mr. Camp. The company last year produced 80 percent as many tractors overseas as it did in the United States. The total was under 10 percent in 1949, "and you could have put our 1939 production in your right eye," he says.

Actually, as its name indicates, International Harvester has produced some farm machinery abroad since the present firm was organized in 1902. But up to World War II, much of the equipment made abroad was not produced here. "It was geared to the needs of particular countries—a mower suited to the speed of a camel," a Harvester official explains. Harvester served foreign markets for tractors by exporting machines produced here.

But at the end of World War II there was a severe dollar shortage abroad and foreign nations were also trying to get on a self-sustaining basis. So they set up import restrictions. "It was a case of produce abroad or walk away from the business entirely," the Harvester official explains. The competitive advantage of producing abroad and shipping to the United States only now is becoming apparent, he adds.

Meanwhile the domestic industry has actually shrunk in size since the postwar tractor buying spree that saw more than 600,000 units move to farmers in 1951. Even an improved year in 1958 left tractor production at just 234,000 units. Trade officials figure industry tractor capacity is under 500,000 units a year now.

To get an idea how important foreign plants of U.S. concerns are in the world market, the top three Western Hemisphere firms in foreign tractor production, namely Massey-Ferguson, Ford, and Harvester, turned out about 182,400 tractors last year in England, France, and Germany. That's 53 percent of the 342,000 tractors produced by all companies, foreign and United States combined, in those key nations.

WORLD PRODUCTION

Figures on world farm tractor production are scarce. But Harvester, which is forming a worldwide statistics-gathering group within the company to serve its expanding international interests, makes these production estimates by major country (tractors provide the biggest single chunk of farm equipment sales):

Country:	1958 production in units
United States	234,000
Great Britain	140,600
West Germany	118,900
France	83,000
Italy	15,000
Sweden	8,000
Austria	5,000
Argentina	4,500
Canada	4,200
Australia	2,000
Yugoslavia	2,000

(Production in the Soviet Union is unknown.)

One thing that has slowed development of foreign farm machinery concerns is that European farms, by and large, have remained small. The horse-drawn plow, an unusual sight on the Iowa countryside, is commonplace abroad. "The Continent hasn't produced bigger units needed for the bigger farms in volume," explains Harvester's Mr. Keeler. He figures they'll soon begin to, now that export markets are opening in Africa and South America.

With nearly half its capacity abroad, it's natural Harvester and others in the trade would find at least a few of their foreign products suitable for U.S. consumption.

Take the case of Ford. Until recently it had no domestic diesel tractor to offer. But farmers were clamoring for the huskier diesel engines, using cheaper diesel oil instead of gasoline, to pull bigger plows around their expanded acreages. The easy answer: Bring in an already successful overseas model.

A SMALLER RUNT

Or consider Harvester's plans. The runt of its domestic diesel line is a 53-horsepower, $4,400 unit. But some farmers seek a smaller one. So the company turned abroad. "It would cost us $35 million in tooling alone to start fresh and equip a production line for the unit here," says Vice President Keeler. It's costing nothing in tooling to import the item from England, he adds.

"Instead of picking the best city in the country in which to make a product, it's a case now of picking the best city in the world," sums up this official.

Planning production operations on a worldwide basis "avoids duplication and triplication of effort," observes Massey-Ferguson President Thornbrough. "I think you'll see more companies thinking in these terms," he adds.

The technique won't be limited to just the farm equipment industry, says Mr. Rojtman of J. I. Case, currently traveling abroad for the second time in 2 months. "The trend will cover 35 percent of all U.S. industry," he predicts.

Rising imports present some problems to the farm machinery trade. For one thing it appears certain to cut into sales of U.S.-made equipment, at least temporarily. Until 2 years ago Massey-Ferguson imported a tractor but then quit and turned to components instead. "The tractor was competing with existing Detroit capacity," explains Mr. Thornbrough. "That's the problem some of these others are going to run into," he warns.

NEW PRODUCTS

Some U.S. producers are by no means convinced the trend to importing from their foreign plants will be self-destructive in the long run. "We'd hardly let any U.S. facilities stand idle," declares tall, distinguished Brooks McCormick, Harvester executive vice president. "We'd use the plant to develop a new product," he explains.

"We may lose volume in some items where the biggest volumes are overseas," adds this official. But he reasons buying more from the overseas plants should spur trade in both directions, especially stimulating sales of items in which the United States continues to have the volume and the technological edge. "There'll be a lot of whooping and hollering down in Washington about the trend in the short run," he concludes, "but in the long run it's the salvation of our country."

U.S. automation still generally outpaces that of overseas plants in the industry. Consider, for example, that a Harvester tractor made in England takes 224 hours of labor. The same tractor made here takes only 197 hours. Partly this is because cheaper labor puts less pressure on the British plant operators to add more automatic equipment. The result is some items made in big quantity here still can be made more economically than the same item made at a low volume and hence high per-unit cost abroad.

U.S. INDUSTRY SHOWS INTEREST

U.S. industry is also showing considerable interest in Common Market developments. Firms engaging in exports to the area, as well as those with subsidiaries in the Common Market are assessing their competitive position. Some firms are planning to shift from exporting to the area to production within it; others are modifying or consolidating their facilities already located there. Apart from firms with wide European experience, many U.S. companies to whom Western Europe has previously been only of marginal interest are now thinking in terms of subsidiaries within the area or of licensing arrangements with existing Common Market firms.

Some Netherlands statistics show the trend of recent U.S. investments in the Netherlands. The average annual number of U.S. firms establishing new branches in the Netherlands was seven in the 1955–57 period. However, 23 new U.S. firms established themselves in that country in 1958 after the Common Market had come into existence. According to a large Netherlands bank, 47 foreign firms established in the Netherlands in that year, compared with a maximum annual figure of 20 for the preceding 4 years. Similar figures are not yet available for any of the other Common Market countries. Although Holland, for many years, has made particular efforts to attract U.S. investment, it may be assumed that a similar situation prevails in most other Common Market countries and that the influx of U.S. investment there also has been considerable.

Following are a few examples of publicized actions by U.S. industry indicating the type of planning to participate in the Common Market which is being undertaken on a wide scale: Agreements were concluded between several French companies and Westinghouse International in the field of nuclear energy. Underwood Corp. established the firm of Underwood Italiana for producing office machines. Excello Corp. acquired the German firm Goppingen to manufacture machine tools. Other recent actions taken by U.S. firms include the acquisition of a calculating machine company in Germany by Smith-Corona Marchant, a licensing agreement between General Motors and a Belgian firm for the production of diesel engines, the establishment of a plant for production of orlon fiber by Du Pont in the Netherlands and another plant for the production of paints in Belgium, the acquisition of an interest in the Simca works in France by the Chrysler Corp. the acquisition by Container Corp. of America of a majority interest in a German paper manufacturing company, and the establishment of a cardboard firm by the same U.S. company in another German location.

In all, recent developments indicate investment in the Common Market is accelerating and that U.S. companies account for a considerable share of this new investment.

EXPORT OF VENTURE CAPITAL WILL GROW

(By Harold B. Dorsey)

An article in the latest issue of Foreign Commerce Weekly (Department of Commerce) reports that American businesses are setting themselves up inside the six-nation European Common Market in growing numbers. Some of these companies which have been making goods in this country and exporting them to Europe are planning to shift their production to Europe. Many other companies with little previous interest in Europe are now thinking in terms of subsidiaries within the area or licensing arrangements with existing firms there.

A dispatch from Frankfurt, Germany, last week reports that United States brokers have recently been buying a large number of shares of German companies in the West German stock market, causing some rather sharp gains in the prices of those stocks.

A group of about 70 Wall Street investment analysts went to Europe last week for a tour of about 3 weeks to explore the clues which suggest that the growth prospects of some of the foreign companies may be more attractive than their American counterparts.

The United Nations economic commission for Europe released a report last week which recommended a more vigorous expansion of business activity in the area. The report said that there were many favorable factors in Europe's present economic situation to encourage governments to adopt policies more propitious to business expansion. The improvement in the international financial liquidity position of most Western European countries was noted.

The Commission of the European Economic Community (EEC), the executive administrative body for the European Common Market, reported last week that the initial lowering of tariffs and enlargement of import quotas put into effect at the start of this year may increase French trade with other community members by 15 percent and that of Germany, Italy, and the Benelux countries (Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg) from 3 percent to 5 percent. The ultimate objective of the European Common Market is the elimination of trade barriers between the subject countries so that there will finally develop a mass market consisting of the total population of these six countries, about 160 million people.

The U.N.'s economic commission in a review of developments in Russia and Eastern Europe last year pointed out that total output of goods and services in that area appeared to have increased by about 6 percent to 9 percent. Industry continued to expand at about the same rate as during 1957. The report attributed the continued rapid growth of Communist industrial production to a more intensive use of capital and to a rise in labor productivity.

Other foreign comment suggests that some of America's traditional Allies are complaining about a return of U.S. attitudes toward protectionism, while still extolling the virtues of free trade. Switzerland interprets our attitude toward Swiss watch imports as verging on the unfriendly; Canada is justifiably upset by our arbitrary restrictions against imports of her lead, zinc and oil; Britain thinks it unfair that we should reject her bids to supply this country with electric power generating equipment at prices very substantially below those of the lowest U.S. producer; Venezuela is certainly not very happy about our restrictions on the import of Venezuelan oil; nor can Japan completely understand the restrictions which we have placed on our imports of Japanese textiles.

The foregoing recent observations have one thing in common; they all suggest that very considerable success has attended the postwar efforts of the United States to restore the economies of war-riddled Europe and to build up the economies of some of the underdeveloped nations. From the humane viewpoint and from the international political viewpoint, our Government and our entire body of taxpayers are entitled to a feeling of gratification for the achievement. This does not necessarily mean that further economic aid should be suspended. That question involves matters that are not germane to this particular discussion.

But the facts of the current economic condition do present problems for the business analyst in his diagnosis of the American economy. Highly skilled investment managers, as noted above, are beginning to give tangible financial support to the prospect that industrial growth trends in Western Europe in the next 5 years are likely to be superior to our own. That does not necessarily mean that our own trends will be negative; it primarily reflects the fact that the European countries will be progressing from a lower base than ours and therefore they can more easily record a better year-to-year growth on a percentage basis. The latter is the factor that is of keen interest to the astute investment manager in his constant search for the best possible growth in the earnings of his investments.

It seems likely that there will be a larger export of American venture capital—the kind of capital that has been most responsible for this country's superior progress in the standard of living throughout most of our history. It must be admitted that our national policies in the past decade or so have discouraged the profitable functioning of venture capital, so the foreign fields may appear to be relatively greener.

It would seem that the international condition indicated by some of the foregoing observations should be taken into serious consideration by those who may influence domestic business conditions, primarily the leadership of business, labor, and government. Certainly, it is a fact that the status of our import and export relationships is far less favorable to our employment and business activity today than it has been throughout the entire postwar period. It is reasonable to presume that this significant change should call for some alteration in the determination of our business, labor, and government policies.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 26, 1959]

OUT OF REASON'S MARKET

Some American machine toolmakers are buying foreign companies to produce and sell both abroad and in the United States, and this trend is expected to grow. The reason is that the U.S.-made products are running into increasing price competition trouble with foreign-made products.

Steelmakers will try to counter union demands this spring with the argument, among others, that higher prices may mean more imports from abroad and fewer jobs for American steelworkers. And in point of fact, steel imports have been rising and exports declining.

Automakers are finding that while imports from abroad continue to mount, their own overseas sales are sliding in about the same proportion.

In all these examples—and others could easily be cited—is a common thread: U.S. products are pricing themselves out of world markets. This is one of the important things that is going to be studied by Vice President NIXON's new Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth.

Now the immediate significance of the pricing-out-of-the-market trend can doubtless be exaggerated. But it is happening, and there is little reason to suppose it will not become a problem of serious proportions unless something is done. So the question is: What should be done?

The protectionists have a ready answer; they are already mounting, through their numerous spokesmen, a campaign to build a higher wall of tariffs, quotas, and other restrictive devices around American industry. There are many things that can be said about this point of view—that it forces the consumer to pay higher prices than he otherwise would have to; that to try to protect some American firms is automatically unfair to others.

But for the present discussion, perhaps the most useful thing to say about the protectionist answer is that it does not come to grips with the problem. The protectionists say the trouble is that foreign wage rates are usually lower than American. U.S. productive efficiency, however, has long been able to more than compensate for that cost disadvantage; the unarguable fact is that the United States has been highly successful in competing against foreigners both on its home ground and theirs.

That this country is now showing signs, in some fields, of losing out, suggests that rising wages and prices are beginning to outrun the compensating power of American efficiency. In the case of American machine tools, the average price has doubled in the past decade, which naturally reflects mounting wage costs. But then the question must be posed, How is it possible for such increases to have occurred?

A considerable part of the answer is the fact of Government-induced inflation. Some people talk as though inflation were at the most a future threat, but of course we have been having inflation right along—a lot of it up until about 1951, less since. From inflation spring the wage increases that exceed productivity gains and the consequent price rises now beginning to play hob with our competitive ability. In short, the inflation we have permitted through years of Federal red ink is starting to catch up with us in world markets.

Now protectionism is plainly no answer to inflation; indeed, it is a self-defeating notion. If we cut off our international trade, we will likely spur inflation without saving our domestic industry, which will simply become higher cost, less efficient and less competitive.

Equally clearly, one might think, more inflation cannot be a solution of inflation. Yet today many in Congress are in effect saying just that. They are trying to keep the Government on the path of heavy inflationary deficits because they profess to think that is the path to economic growth. Unhappily it is the way not to sound economic growth, but to economic contraction and eventually to finance collapse.

The way to deal with inflation is to stop inflating. What is beginning to happen to our international trade is one more sharp warning that the time to stop is long past and we had better not wait much longer.

The American people ought to consider that warning before they let either the protectionists or the inflationists price them out of reason's market.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 105) was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the private investment of American capital abroad with a view to determining the extent of such investment; the changes which have occurred therein in recent years; the effect of such investment on domestic industries in terms of employment, profits, and markets; and the effect of such investment on the economies of foreign countries. In the conduct of such study and investigation the committee shall consider the effect on such investment of existing tax, tariff, monetary, labor, and other regulatory policies of the Federal Government. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its study and investigation, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

UNIFICATION OF IRELAND—ELECTION BY PEOPLE OF ALL IRELAND

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators DODD, KEATING, and WILLIAMS of New Jersey, I submit, for appropriate reference, a resolution requestiong that an election be held in all Ireland under United Nations auspices at which the people of Eire and Northern Ireland would vote on the question of Irish unification.

Traditionally, the United States has tried to help peoples who are seeking unification or a legitimate expression of their desire for self-determination as they see it. Incorporated in the charter of the League of Nations, expressly reaffirmed by the United States and Great Britain in their signing of the Atlantic Charter, and set forth as a fundamental principle of the United Nations Charter now upheld by 81 nations, the doctrine of self-determination of peoples was integrated into 20th century foreign policy by President Woodrow Wilson in his historic Fourteen Points issued in 1917.

Since then, the application of this principle in the form of plebiscites held under the auspices of the League of Nations or the United Nations has led to the peaceful resolution of at least half a dozen separate disputes of grave international concern. The situation in Ireland today, which periodically erupts into violence and bloodshed, is certainly deserving of no less fundamental a solution in the interests of international peace and security. Partition was effected in 1920 when 6 of the 9 counties in Ulster were separated from the other 26 counties and became Northern Ireland.

The authority under which the United Nations could act to hold elections in Ireland is found in article 11 of the Charter. It states that the General Assembly "may discuss any question relating to the maintenance of international peace and security * * * and may make recommendations with regard to any such question to the state or states concerned or to the Security Council or to both." In addition, article 35 should be invoked, which allows a state to bring a dispute to the attention of the United Nations "if it accepts in advance for the purposes of the dispute the obligations of pacific settlement provided in the Charter."

The text of my resolution is as follows:

That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the maintenance of international peace and security requires settlement of the question of the unification of Ireland and that the people of all Ireland, including the people of Eire and the people of Northern Ireland, should have a free opportunity to express their will for union and that this be attained by an election of the people of all Ireland under the auspices of a United Nations Commission for Ireland, to be designated by the General Assembly pursuant to Articles 11 and 35 of the Charter, which shall establish the terms and conditions of such election.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 106) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE KENNEDY-ERVIN LABOR REFORM BILL

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as we continue debating the demerits of the Kennedy-Ervin bill, the press of the country continues to become more aware of the deficiencies of that piece of proposed legislation.

I have in my hand an article from the New York Herald Tribune of April 16, under the headline "McCLELLAN for Stiffer Kennedy Bill."

Because the articles, editorials, and so on, on this subject are so pertinent to the matter we are discussing in the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that a number of them be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Apr. 16, 1959]

McCLELLAN FOR STIFFER KENNEDY BILL—ASSERTS LABOR CAN'T CLEAN ITS OWN HOUSE

Senator JOHN L. McCLELLAN, Democrat, of Arkansas, said here last night he is willing to have his union-reform bills considered as amendments to the Kennedy-Ervin bill, on which debate began yesterday in the Senate. He called his five bills "the minimum that is required to provide an adequate legislative remedy for conditions that now prevail."

Senator McCLELLAN, who flew to New York in the evening to speak at the annual dinner of the Brand Names Foundation, said that labor cannot clean its own house of brutal, cynical men to whom unionism means only a royal road to personal riches and power. The Senator, chairman of the Senate Rackets Committee, declared that the remedy will have to be provided by strong and effective legislation.

The first of Senator McCLELLAN's bills would provide minimum ethical standards for unions, require reports on financial and administrative affairs and compel secret ballots in union elections. It would give union members whose rights had been violated an opportunity for judicial or administrative hearings.

FIVE YEARS IN PRISON

Among its penalties, the bill would impose $10,000 fines and 5 years in prison for using force to prevent the use of any rights granted to union members in the bill.

The four other bills would require the National Labor Relations Board to surrender certain jurisdictions to the States; outlaw hot cargo clauses; prevent secondary boycott, and prevent picketing aimed either at extracting payoffs from an employer at forcing an employer to place his workers in a union against their will.

"Some will charge," the Senator said, "that these measures are too drastic; that they are punitive and restrictive. I submit they are not drastic, they are preventive; they are not punitive, they are protective; and they restrict and prohibit only that which is criminal or improper."

LABOR NEEDS HELP IN CLEANING HOUSE

(By George E. Sokolsky)

The head of a labor union, under our laws and practices, is an exceptional person who has a legitimate right, under the National Labor Relations Act, to control the lives, social status, and liberties of other human beings. He is not a Government official, but he can, in a particular industry, decide on a man's right to work. He can make men rich or poor or even beggar them. He is the master of an enormous treasury, often running into hundreds of millions of dollars, and is accountable legally to no one for its management. His income taxes are not subject to the same kind of investigation as are those of other citizens because labor union funds are not subject to taxation or investigation, except if a congressional committee makes an investigation which is usually spasmodic and limited.

The various proposals to correct this condition and to remove an elite from American life are not very serious in this direction. Senator JOHN KENNEDY'S proposals for the rectification of the errors of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations seem to be an effort to run interference for the labor leaders. Secretary of Labor Mitchell's efforts are not much better.

I note that a bill has been introduced in the Legislature of the State of North Dakota which hits one nail on the head, namely, gangster control of labor unions, which reads:

"No person who has been convicted of any crime involving moral turpitude or of a felony, excepting traffic violations, shall serve in any official capacity or as any officer in any labor union or labor organization in this State. No such person, nor any labor union or labor organization in which he is an officer shall be qualified to act as a bargaining agent or representative for employees in this State. Such disqualification shall terminate whenever such officer is removed or resigns as an officer in such labor union or labor organization."

Such provisions in Federal or State laws would eliminate one group of difficult persons in the labor union setup, namely, the gangster and racketeer. But it does not solve the whole problem, which is that bossing a labor union is a profitable business.

RACKETEERS SEE A BUCK

The gangster and racketeer moved into organized labor shortly after prohibition because he recognized it as good business. It was much like the Sicilian padrone system, the boss, in effect, renting men's time for a wage for the worker and a consideration for himself. Long before Lepke organized Murder, Inc., for instance, he had organized a goon squad in the garment industries, sometimes working for bosses, sometimes for unions, sometimes for combinations of bosses and unions to keep competitors out of business. This trafficking in murder, arson, etc., was particularly notable during the deep depression years and continued after Lepke and his partner, Gurrah, were deprived of their lives by an ungrateful State which did not appreciate their services. (Gurrah died in Sing Sing.)

The gangster muscled into the labor movement, organizing new unions, particularly in the CIO which in its early stages used anyone who was willing to serve. A startling combination came into existence among Communists and the mob, as it is often called. This group developed great power in the labor movement, particularly among the Teamsters.

Various efforts have been made by the older and more respectable labor leaders to rid themselves of gangsters and racketeers but it has not been easy. One cannot call a man a gangster, a racketeer, a member of the Mafia unless the law does it first and in many places in this country, the mob owns the law. The association of mobsters and politicians inside and outside the labor movement has been a deep peril not only to organized labor but to the United States.

It would be to the greatest advantage to organized labor if the mob were taken out of it, but organized labor cannot clean its own house, as the expression goes, for two reasons: One, because the mob has lots of votes; and secondly, because few men who lead unions have not at some stage laid themselves open to attack for the same things that the newer and less respectable leaders are now doing. The job must be done from the outside, but it must be done impartially. Making one man the goat, as for instance, picking Jimmy Hoffa as the one, outstanding bad boy, will not do the job.

NO ACTION AT THIS SESSION SEEN TO END LABOR RACKETS

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON.—The American people may not realize it yet, but the Congress isn't going to do anything at this session that really will put an end to the racketeering in labor unions. This is already conceded privately by the leaders on both sides.

Actually, none of the proposed measures, even if passed, would eliminate the corruption that has been exposed at the hearings conducted by Senator McCLELLAN and his committee.

One of the most significant comments has just come from George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO. In an interview in the current issue of Dun's Review and Modern Industry, Meany pointed out that the unions alone cannot stop the abuses. Here is an excerpt:

Question. "Do you believe that labor legislation now pending in the Congress will provide adequate power to curb these abuses?"

NO LEGAL POWER

Answer. "Adequate power? Frankly, these abuses could not be stopped by the unions alone. The trade-union movement is trying to do what it can in this field. We think we have some moral responsibility to do this. But the AFL–CIO has no legal responsibility to curb corruption in union locals. We aren't a law-enforcement agency, and we don't have the power of subpena. We couldn't possibly call a trade-union official before our council and say "We are suspicious; we don't like the way things are going.' Certainly we would not hesitate to take action where we had proof of wrongdoing or corruption. But we must have the proof, and we haven't got the machinery to go out and make these investigations.

"So, to answer your question, we don't feel that the requirements of the Kennedy-Ervin bill would eliminate corruption. We do think it would curb some of these people because they will have to report all their financial transactions. We think the Kennedy-Ervin bill is a step in the right direction, but the real problem of corruption is the failure of the law-enforcement authorities to act."

CITES RACKETEERS

"The jukebox and coin-machine business points it up quite clearly. Here's one of our big industries, in the billion-dollar class, and it's honeycombed with gangsters and thugs operating with the connivance of greedy businessmen and with the cognizance of the law enforcement authorities.

"It is quite obvious that the real answer to corruption, whether in unions or anywhere else, is better law enforcement. Nobody runs to the American Bankers Association every time a cashier defaults or somebody on the inside robs a bank—they expect the local district attorney to handle that. When companies engage in business frauds, nobody runs to the chamber of commerce or the National Association of Manufacturers and says, 'What are you going to do about law enforcement?' No, they expect the local district attorney to do it."

CAN'T STOP HOFFA

This correspondent read the foregoing quotation to MCCLELLAN and asked him for his opinion on it. The Arkansas Senator said:

"They say they do not have the power, and that is correct. They can't stop a Hoffa. That's why laws are needed. If they had the power, and would be diligent in exercising it, we probably wouldn't need additional laws, or so many laws. But they cannot deal with people like Hoffa, and it's imperative that we enact laws to at least curb—you never completely prevent—crime of any kind."

Question. "I wonder why the local district attorneys haven't done more on this?"

Answer. "I think the simple answer to that is politics. They control—just like they control an industry or control an operation. They have the political power where they control often the people in public office."

Question. "You mean the unions do?"

Answer. "Sure. Or the union racketeers—that element in them. There's no question about that."

All this points up to the fact that labor unions are not at all analogous to trade associations or groups of businesses. The labor unions have a monopoly power. They get it out of existing laws and also out of the refusal of Congress to include labor unions as within the jurisdiction of anti-monopoly or antitrust laws.

[From the Miami Herald, Mar. 27, 1959]

CONGRESS AND THE TEAMSTER MESS—TALK, TALK, BUT NO ACTION

Since 1957 when it opened for business, the Senate Rackets Committee has taken thousands of hours of testimony and has heard hundreds of witnesses, most of them from the lowest rungs of humanity.

Nothing the committee has heard, however, more nearly scoured the bottom of social depravity than the Teamster Union scheme to exploit race feeling in the Miami area.

According to a letter reputedly written by a local Teamster official, Negro union members and their families were to be paraded in a new white housing section.

Ostensibly, one family would seek to buy a house. The expected turndown would then produce a suit and a row in the courts because the mortgages are federally guaranteed.

But the hidden purpose, as our David Kraslow reports from Washington, is to bludgeon a big Miami builder into using union-delivered cement.

Anyone who exploits racial feeling in such a manner deserves the contempt of all races and groups. This area of group relations is extremely sensitive. Men of good will, including many union leaders themselves, are bending every effort to reduce tensions and combat race baiting.

The man behind this scheme heard himself described as one of the "sorriest crumbs with which humanity was ever infested." The words are those of committee chairman, JOHN MCCLELLAN, who has asked for an investigation of the incident by the Justice Department and the Civil Rights Commission.

But words and investigations hardly faze the subjects of what Senator MCCLELLAN once described as Jimmy Hoffa's hoodlum empire.

Only laws, strictly enforced, are of any real use.

As we said, the rackets investigation got going in 1957.

In nearly 2 years of testimony, the Senate committee has produced every manner of sensation. Congressional Quarterly Almanac puts it this way: "The investigators have turned up all the essential ingredients of a Mickey Spillane thriller—human torch, woman scorned, disappearing attorney, gargantuan witness, blonde mankiller, hot jewels, and repeated reference to people in high places."

And hear us—it has turned up everything but a labor law that would protect decent unionists and all the rest of us from labor racketeers.

The last Congress spent 8 months chewing over the Kennedy-Ives anticorruption bill—a puny thing at best—and quite without any labor reform legislation.

On Wednesday the Senate Labor Committee approved without major change another Kennedy bill. Missing was a ban on secondary boycotts, the very tactic involved in the Miami Teamsters' proposed excursion into race baiting.

Congress is at home for the Easter recess.

Will it hear from the people?

Their swelling voice could be its master in this sorry mess.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE REPORT ON RESPONSES TO BUSINESS QUESTIONNAIRE REGARDING PRIVATE INVESTMENT ABROAD

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the Department of Commerce is today submitting to every Member a very important report, to which I wish to invite the attention of Senators. The report is entitled "Responses To Business Questionnaire Regarding Private Investment Abroad," prepared by the Assistant Secretary for International Affairs of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

This report analyzes the reasons why American business believes it will or will not invest overseas. The answers were obtained in order to support the study made by the Department of State, or under its auspices under section 413(c) of the Mutual Security Act. The study was actually directed by Ralph Strauss, of New York. It related to the extent to which the foreign policy of the United States should be supported by the private economic system. The report was issued on April 1, but the responses of 1,000 American businessmen, which were used as the basis for the report, are now printed in the document to which I have referred. They prove to be equally important, for this reason:

It is now clear that the Soviets have undertaken a major economic offensive against the free world. When we talk about the fact that we are being distracted by Berlin from looking to the Middle East and Iraq, we should also remember that we should not allow ourselves to be distracted by Berlin from the real economic war being waged upon us, not only in the field of aid, which is itself very important, because the Soviet Union and Communist China are now putting out appreciable amounts of foreign aid, in a governmental sense, but also in the field of trade, especially as regards raiding the free world markets for basic commodities, such as residual fuel oil, aluminum, and tin.

This operation can be more destructive, in terms of the cold war, than the hydrogen bomb, in terms of a hot war. The danger is that our attention is diverted from the real peril, and we look at something else the Soviets want us to look at, such as Berlin.

It seems clear to me, and it is being made clearer to many of us as we read the press items, including those relating to the address by Mr. Hoffman to the International Chamber of Commerce, the address by Secretary Anderson in New York, and recent addresses by Vice President NIXON and other authorities, that the private credit and investment system of the United States must be relied upon primarily to do the job which needs to be done. Today we are investing overseas about $3.1 billion net, annually. The total stands at $28 billion.

As revealed by the questionnaire to which I urgently invite the attention of every Senator, business looks to the Federal Government, not for direct financial participation as a means of reducing the risks of trade and investment in the underdeveloped countries—though in many cases business finds guarantees and similar techniques useful—but the major thing for which business looks to the Federal Government is increased promotion and protection of our investments in foreign countries, improved information service, and, very important, equitable tax treatment.

There is quite a conflict in the Government between the Treasury Department and the Department of State. Upon another occasion I shall address myself in great detail to that conflict.

Finally, business is interested in the expansion of investment guarantees, such as those now in the Mutual Security Act. Our objective must be to at least double United States private investment. Businessmen themselves, by answers to the questionnaire to which I have referred, have shown us one of the ways by which to accomplish that purpose.

I hope Senators will pay very serious attention to this extremely important document.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I commend the Senator very heartily for his remarks concerning foreign economic policy, and for bringing that subject to the attention of the Senate, which he did a week or so ago. On the Senator's advice I obtained a copy of the fine report by the Department of State and studied it. I believe that in that report, as the Senator says, there are some very sound recommendations for the promotion of trade, and particularly the promotion of American investment abroad, which, as the Senator from New York says, would be very helpful in our world relationships, particularly in the cold economic war which is so troublesome to us.

Mr. JAVITS. I am very grateful to my colleague, who is himself a leader in the investment world. He has always ben very helpful in this effort.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

DRUG ADDICTS AND CRIME

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an article entitled "Drug Addicts and Crime," written by Edward T. Mancuso and published in the February 1959 issue of Frontier magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DRUG ADDICTS AND CRIME: A STUDENT OF THE PROBLEM SUGGESTS A NEW APPROACH

(By Edward T. Mancuso)

For almost a half century, State and Federal laws, primarily punitive in their impact, have failed to solve the narcotic problem. Much of our frustration with respect to this social dilemma stems from the inability of those most concerned in trying to find a solution to the problem, to make a true evaluation of its nature and extent.

The nonaddicted seller is the person who must assume primary responsibility for the existence of this problem. It is because of his greed and avarice that the cancerous-like affliction of addiction to narcotics has extended its tentacles into the very vitals of the body politic. The problem of the nonaddicted seller, not unlike that of any ordinary criminal, stems from a flagrant disregard of the moral and legal obligations which the individual owes to society as an entirety. His abject thinking leads him to the conclusion that he need not cooperate with, but may, and must, do everything to destroy the moral fiber of society. He is a true criminal and should be treated as such. The extent to which he should be punished is a matter that I am willing to leave to the legislature and the judiciary.

The pusher constitutes a group more numerous than the nonaddicted seller. The pusher is a sort of hybrid, being both a seller and a user. His activity as a seller, experience has proved, is geared to a necessity created by his own addiction. Punitive action standing alone is not the solution to his problem. Action which seeks to punish the pusher by confining him in jail results only in a temporary alleviation of the sociological problem created by his unfortunate existence. However, such punitive action completely ignores his psychological and physiological problems, which spring into being as a result of his dependency on drugs. Accordingly, it seems to me, that some plan must be devised wherein greater attention is given to the alleviation of the physical and mental problems which beset the pusher.

Perhaps the most difficult aspect of the total problem is the drug addict—a poor unfortunate soul who for one reason or the other too numerous to mention or outline here—has developed a dependency on drugs. The best available figures—estimates only—indicate the existence of more than 60,000 known addicts in the United States; how many more there may be no one really knows. Nevertheless, the 60,000 figure creates some cause for alarm. There is even greater cause for alarm when one realizes that the habit in America frequently begins in adolescence or the early twenties, and dwindles out in the mid-forties, thus the active stages of the habit cover the most productive years of the victim's life and society is to that extent deprived of any worthwhile contributions which he might make during that period. In California in 1957, 80 percent of males convicted for narcotic violations were under 35 years of age. (Bureau of Criminal Statistics, Department of Justice, State of California.)

PROPAGANDA BY THE POLICE

Purely aside from the seriousness of the problem of addiction, society has intentionally been misled by self-serving law-enforcement officials with respect to the true implications of the problem. The general population, victims of today's mass media of communication, has been induced to believe that narcotics, per se, precipitate all sorts of wierd, bizarre, and evil responses on the part of its victims. This propaganda, emanating from law enforcement agencies and uninformed politicians, is definitely untrue. The truth is that narcotics induce a state of lethargy in their users, a sort of supine, detached mood that makes them totally oblivious either to the advantages or disadvantages of their environment. A jolt of heroin, in its initial impact, has the effect of suspending the user in an ethereal world between the real and the imaginary. It is a gross inversion of fact to say that the addict, while under the influence of narcotics, is propelled toward violence, theft, and criminal acts in general. It is significant that the Bureau of Criminal Statistics reports:

"Very few addicts were among those committed to prison for sex offenses, assault, or homicide."

With the problem thus clearly delineated, many suggestions have emerged as to its solution. On the one hand there is that school of thought whose chief exponents are such distinguished men as Narcotics Commissioner Harry J. Anslinger and Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz, who advocate stronger punitive measures as the only solution to the problem. They argue that the only way to dry up the narcotic traffic is to confine all narcotic addicts.

On the other hand, there is the second school of thought espoused by such distinguished men as Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, New York City's Chief Magistrate John M. Murtagh and a host of psychologists, sociologists and physicians who feel that a medical approach should be made to the problem and that addicts should be provided free, or at a nominal cost, dosages to satisfy their craving.

Statistics seem to indicate the conclusion that in those areas in which a get tough policy has been followed the problem has been ostensibly lessened but this by no means indicates that it has been eliminated in these areas.

Those who advocate stricter law enforcement and stiffer sentences for the addict and addict-peddler fail to face up to one inevitable fact and that is that the narcotic addict as such is incurable and so long as he is on the street the problem is a simple one of demand and supply. The addict, of necessity, demands drugs to satisfy his acquired tolerance and the seller, irrespective of legal restrictions, will seek to supply that demand. One obvious answer to the problem, according to the advocates of punitive measures, is to confine all addicts or junkies for the rest of their lives.

In the United States today, we are filling our jails with addicts and addict-peddlers and spending close to $100 million annually on the National, State, and local level in apprehending and confining these people who are treated as criminals.

MEDICAL TREATMENT PROPOSED

It is a rare occasion where you hear of the supplier being apprehended or taken into custody. By simply treating the addict as a medical problem, rather than treating him as a criminal, we would thereby take all of the profit out of drugs, destroy the market for the supplier, and ease our crowded jail problem at the same time. This money that is now being spent to apprehend and confine the addict and addict-peddler could then be diverted to apprehending actual criminals, or for other social purposes for the benefit of the community as a whole.

The attitudes with respect to narcotic use and subsequent addiction depend to a large extent upon religion, economics, class consciousness, ethics, group morality, availability of drugs, and other factors, all of which tend to influence the acceptance or rejection of particular drugs.

In the United States people look upon opiate users as lazy, shiftless, and unreliable. On the other hand, people like the concept of aggressiveness and look upon vigorous, ambitious, go-getters as real he-men, and alcohol, which emphasizes such qualities, is socially acceptable today.

However, alcohol, unlike narcotics, is linked with crimes of violence, automobile accidents, and a host of other social problems all of which can be said to be the direct result of alcoholic consumption. Nevertheless, the alcoholic is being looked upon as a sick person, whereas the narcotic addict is still treated as a criminal.

THE PROBLEM IN OTHER COUNTRIES

Great Britain and other European countries look upon drug addiction as a medical problem and keep it primarily in the hands of the physician.

What is even more significant, European users add to the crime problem in only a minor way, and the illicit traffic there is feeble compared to ours. Almost all English addicts are reported to be over 30 years old, while 80 percent of ours in California are under 35. In England, addicts are known, registered, and productive citizens of the community. Medical men are more and more inclined toward the view that drug addiction is a disease or a symptom of a disturbed or abnormal personality that requires drugs in order to be able to cope with life.

What then is the solution to this perplexing problem? It seems simple enough if society and the legislators will stop confusing sickness with sin and creating crime where crime does not exist.

It is obvious that to find the solution to drug addiction requires some basic research. The Council on Mental Health of the American Medical Association, in conjunction with the American Bar Association, recently suggested that a limited experiment be devised which would test directly the hypothesis that clinics, if given a fair trial, would eliminate the illicit traffic and reduce drug addiction. I subscribe 100 percent to this approach. It is said that such an experimental clinic will provide data on the best methods of dealing with narcotic addicts outside institutional walls and will contribute greatly to the ultimate solution of this problem; that it will throw considerable light on causative factors in drug addiction and help in formulation of professional programs. It could also provide indispensable data on the procedures and techniques for dealing with addicts which could be used by the individual physicians in the smaller communities which cannot support public health clinics.

A study of the cured and rehabilitated addicts should also be made in order to determine how and why men and women conquer the drug habit, as well as how and why they become addicted in the first instance.

Finally, the experimental clinic approach affords an opportunity for new insight into what is admittedly a difficult problem. It is a middle-of-the-road approach which takes leave of the dogmatic and ofttimes oppressive punitive approach and, at the same time, refuses to embrace the concept that all punitive measures should be scrapped in favor of free clinics. In short, the experimental clinic method seeks for, instead of assuming, a solution. The data acquired from such clinics could very well serve as the basis of a broad educational program, emphasizing the harmful effects of the use of narcotics by our adolescent groups.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on a Sunday in March, 200 men, women, and children quietly paraded through New York City in a demonstration asking for help. They sought medical aid for the narcotics addicts of the city of New York.

Based on an estimate of 21,000 known addicts in the United States, there are nearly 10,000 in the New York metropolitan area. Projected from an estimate—equally reliable—of 60,000 known addicts in the United States, there must be many more than 10,000 in the New York City area. At least 2,700 of them are under the age of 21. Yet, according to the New York State Bureau of Narcotics Control, there are no hospital beds for the adult addicts who ask for help and there are only 200 beds for the juvenile addicts. The nearest narcotics hospital is the Federal establishment at Lexington, Ky., 600 miles away.

The quiet parade in New York served as an eloquent reminder of the desperate needs of a group of people who are considered as medical cases in other societies but for whose apprehension and confinement treating them unhappily as criminals the United States spends close to $100 million annually. The demonstration ended with the singing of a hymn.

Mr. President, on February 4, I introduced for myself and Senator KEATING a bill (S. 927) for the establishment of a narcotics hospital in New York State, to be jointly operated by the Federal Government, the State of New York and neighboring States that wish to participate. This bill is similar to one which Senator Ives and I introduced in 1958. Representatives ANFUSO and HALPERN have put forward identical legislation in the House.

The establishment of such a hospital would represent an attempt at coping with the problem of narcotics addiction by going to its medical and psychological roots. The article by Edward T. Mancuso, public defender in the city and county of San Francisco, published in the February issue of Frontier, clearly and concisely states some of the reasons why such an attempt should be made.

This is one of our most serious and frustrating problems. My colleague [Mr. KEATING] and I are urging, through a bill, that a new narcotics facility be opened in the city of New York. I invite my colleagues' attention to the article which I have inserted in the RECORD by way of bearing out the urgent character of the problem in the metropolitan area, which I have the honor, in part, to represent.

A BRIGHT ECONOMIC FUTURE WITHOUT INFLATION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD following these remarks an address delivered by Secretary of the Treasury Robert B. Anderson, at an Associated Press luncheon, in New York City on April 20, 1959.

In this memorable address, which I believe is one of the best the Secretary has made, he points out very definitely that this country can have a bright economic future without inflation.

He also says that this country cannot have an enduring bright economic future with inflation, and he makes a very sound and convincing argument on those points, in connection with which he gives us 13 commandments, which he calls guiding principles, which he believes should be a part of our basic thinking in connection with this entire very serious problem.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY TREASURY SECRETARY ROBERT B. ANDERSON AT ASSOCIATED PRESS LUNCHEON, WALDORF ASTORIA HOTEL, NEW YORK CITY, MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1959

This country can have a bright economic future; it can have it without inflation.

This country cannot have an enduring bright economic future with inflation.

This is a principal tenet of my belief. It is a faith I should like to examine with you in historic perspective and as a basis for future real growth in our Nation.

Demosthenes once said: "The time for extracting a lesson from history is ever at hand for them who are wise." Surely the world has never been in greater need of wisdom than now.

The history of every nation is in fact the fruition of the lives and beliefs and ideas of men. Almost 500 years before the birth of Christ, another great leader of the Greek people urged his fellow citizens to "remember that prosperity can be only for the free, and that freedom is the sure possession of those alone who have courage to defend it."

We are dedicated to security that we may preserve freedom. Long-term security must rely on sound economic growth to support it. Should we impair either military security or economic growth in our efforts to achieve both, we shall have failed in our trust.

The story of a nation's downturn has been in one way or another the chronicle of its unwillingness to face reality. Time and again, the choice has been made of an apparent easy way out. People have been misled by a seeming innovation in government or finance, by a misguided leader, or simply through accepting the notion that undesirable developments are inevitable. They have listened to promises that unromantic hard work can be done away with and that difficult problems can be pushed aside.

Where have these choices led?

There is no lack of answers.

Rome is a classic example. But we need not go that far back in history. One has only to look at what happened in Germany after the downfall of the Kaiser. One has only to look at the economic problems which have faced some other European countries—not newcomers to democracy—in recent years.

In the rest of the world, too, are countries which in their efforts to effect rapid economic changes have sacrificed financial soundness. In these countries we may see the dramatic symbols—impressive installations, public works, large buildings. But meanwhile, in all too many instances, the standard of living for the average man has remained low. Prices have gone up. Disease is a scourge. Job opportunities and job security are lacking. The savings which could lead to a better use of both resources and labor sometimes are not forthcoming.

In the United States we have an abundance of resources, skilled manpower, technological capacity. These are vital. But we must relate them to the well-being of people.

We are dedicated to maximum employment. We are equally dedicated to growth in real terms. We are determined to maintain a free economy. These goals are consistent with and contribute to each other.

Every economy is an exercise in change.

Growth is the process of the development and expansion of economic segments. Each day sees a new horizon of accomplishment; tomorrow it becomes a part of our economic fabric. The process takes place when there is a climate of confidence—where there is free play for initiative and incentive. The foundation is the willingness of people to save and invest; the ambition of workers for self-betterment that flows from the right to choose occupations and to bargain for a fair share of the product.

The factor of competition provides a basic insurance against exploitation. It is a motivating drive toward making the best use of new inventions and new processes. It lies at the root of satisfying real demands with the goods and services people want and will work to acquire.

Growth in a competitive society is historically uneven. Members of the same industry tend to expand or contract at the same time in order to maintain competitive positions. There are frequent shifts in geographical areas of operations that bring additional dislocations. In any given period, differing industries may be exhibiting very different patterns of growth or decline.

When a pattern of expansion or retraction becomes general in a number of industries and interests, the economy is characterized by inflationary or recessionary trends.

It is a task of Government to minimize the impact of such adjustments on the individual, the community, and the Nation. It is our task to prevent a spiraling effect in either direction. To this end, we have established certain stabilizers in our Government. We must have an awareness of—and a readiness to use—all of the instrumentalities of Government to prevent undesirable cumulative effects and to soften the impact on every segment of society. We must strive continually to reduce the levels of unemployment.

The utilization of these instrumentalities available to us, however, must be judged in the context of both the short- and long-range effects.

We must remember that although the Government has a number of responsibilities when the economy moves too far in either direction, we are essentially a nation of private, competitive enterprise. The course our economy will pursue is finally determined by the multitudes who engage in every phase of productive activity and of consumption.

The Government taxes and spends and, therefore, plays an important role in the economy. Its influence is felt both through direct demand for goods and services and through the effect of Government requirements on the amounts available for other consumers to buy. However, measured against the scale of national earnings and national consumption, the Government role is not the primary one.

The rate of our growth and the development of our capacity to meet the expanding demands of our economy as a whole are still essentially anchored to the growth and the development of private business and industry.

In considering the task which this imposes on our free enterprise system, I should like to suggest certain guiding principles which I believe should be a part of our basic thinking.

1. We must realize that long-term economic growth in real terms can be achieved not with, but only without, inflation.

2. We must strive for an achievable rate of relatively constant growth—not a succession of sharp ups and downs.

3. We must not, as we come out of a recession, seek to force the economy into a quick boom which can later injure our long-run capacity to produce.

4. We must put major reliance upon the private sector of the economy to increase production.

5. We must give maximum free rein to incentives to save, to work, to produce, to invest.

6. We must maintain the priceless incentive of confidence in the value of money.

7. We must achieve a budget that is in balance or better during periods of high-level activity.

8. We must be willing to seek out the impediments to growth in our economy whether these are found in traditional business practices, in organized labor, in Government subsidy programs, or in any other area.

9. We must encourage the inventiveness and research necessary for new products, new jobs, and improved living standards in a growing economy.

10. We must accept the imposition of discipline and prudent responsibility.

11. We must not passively allow either inflation or deflation to run its course.

12. We must—and by "we" I mean businessmen, workers, investors, and not only officials of Government—make our day-to-day decisions with the welfare of the whole in mind, and not merely the advantage of the moment for some narrow segment.

13. Finally, we must have confidence—and this confidence I have deep faith is well justified—that the American people are wise enough and perceptive enough to support the principles which can leave for your children and mine an America not ravaged by economic turmoil, but full of strength and growth and hope.

In sharp contrast to these principles, we are hearing talk today on what I believe to be some false assumptions.

One of them is that "a little inflation is good for economic growth."

So long as our aim is to increase real wages and real goods and services, I do not believe that any characteristic which could contribute to the debasement of the currency is a desirable ingredient in our economy.

Concern about price inflation during periods of rapid peacetime growth is a relatively new phenomenon. Most of the price inflation in our history has been the accompaniment or the aftermath of war. During the previous century, price inflation was associated with the War of 1812, the banking and credit inflation of the 1830's, and the Civil War. In this century, it has been associated with World War I, World War II, and the Korean war.

Apart from these temporary periods, our great economic growth since the beginning of the 19th century frequently has occurred against the background of a general downtrend in prices. This was particularly marked in the late 1800's. But it has been evident also in this century.

From 1910 to 1915, for example, manufacturing production increased 30 percent while prices showed a moderate decline. During the decade of the 1920's we had one of the most notable periods of sustained economic growth in the history of our country prior to World War II, with national output rising 50 percent in 8 years. Yet this decade was characterized by remarkable price stability. Between 1951 and 1955, a period again characterized by relative stability in the broad indexes of wholesale and consumer prices, we reached the most prosperous levels attained in our economy up to that time.

It is not only our experience of the recent and war-remote past that demonstrates growth goes hand in hand with stable prices.

Any realistic appraisal of continuing instability, with the speculation and the waste that inflation produces, makes it quite clear that this is not the way to attain steady and enduring growth.

Then, too, the judgments of businessmen and investors would be distorted and create maladjustments which could finally result in serious fluctuations in the economy. Also, of course, if serious inflation occurs, public opinion may well demand Government controls over almost every facet of our lives.

I am confident that this Nation is not now going to adopt a philosophy that inflation is a necessary part of the price of progress. For in addition to what it does to our economic structure, inflation exacts a penalty that would be levied on the pocketbook of every American. It would fall with the most hardship on the wage earner, the self-employed, the teachers, the holders of insurance policies, depositors in savings associations, parents trying to provide for their children's education, those on social security, and others like them. The rich and those with the capacity for self-protection would suffer least.

Such a doctrine I reject.

Another false assumption we hear discussed is that deficit financing has little to do with inflation.

The fact is that when the Government has to borrow from commercial banks, as is often the case in times of high business activity, such borrowing adds to the money supply by the amount of the borrowing and so increases inflationary pressures. Continued deficits are bound to add to monetary inflation. They are bound to have the same effect, over a period of time, as a resort to printing press money.

Today, our gross national product for the first quarter on an annual basis is $465 billion. Personal income for the first quarter stood at an annual rate of almost $366 billion. Corporate profits for the first quarter of this year are at an alltime high. The Federal Reserve Board index of industrial production has reached 147—another alltime high.

If in a period like this we say to ourselves and to the world that we cannot live within our means, everyone has the right to ask: When do you expect to do so?

Finally, one hears from time to time that the efforts to balance the budget are without hope. This assumption I also reject.

On the revenue side, we estimated our revenue in January to be $77 billion. Today, I believe there is even more evidence to support this estimate than there was last January.

The level of expenditures as submitted in the January budget continues to be sound. I believe that there will be a great deal more said about how we divide the Government's income in the fiscal year 1960 than there will be about how much more than our income we as a nation are willing to spend.

I have this judgment because I believe that the American people have shown and are showing their determination to pursue prudent policies that help avoid dangerous pressures for either inflation or deflation.

In a free economy, we can never wholly eliminate the incidence of inflationary pressures during some periods and recessionary pressures during others. The problem is to walk the narrow path which allows neither to become dominant, to maintain the capacity and the willingness to exercise flexibility and reversibility, and to constantly pursue the sound objective of maximum employment, reasonable growth, and freedom of economic activity.

Recession must not be allowed to develop in a cumulative downward spiral of declining wages and profits, reduced buying, and curtailed employment. These factors, if unimpeded, feed upon each other. Monetary policy, our fiscal system, the utilization of unemployment compensation, and other resources at the command of the Government must be wisely administered in terms of both the short and the long run.

By the same token, we must maintain a constant awareness of the dangers of inflation during the upward swing of the cycle. However unpopular, we must be willing to exercise at such a time the restraints which changes in monetary controls, Government fiscal policy, and the maintenance of budgetary surpluses can bring about.

We must remember that what we are trying to protect is our way of life. This protection cannot be accomplished by having absolute controls over prices, wages, salaries, choice of occupation, right to expand, and similar activities of a free society. If we resort to such controls we surrender many of our freedoms and threaten others.

In a competitive economy which is going to have its adjustments from time to time, how then are we going to assure national security and at the same time pursue a long-range policy of economic soundness and the furtherance of human welfare?

The administration is determined to do this, first, by adopting policies which give primary call on our resources and our output to maintaining the physical security of the United States. The determination of what this involves must be made by the one man who has the responsibility for a comprehensive view of the total national effort—the President.

After that, we must determine how much of our resources we can afford to give to promoting growth and a rising standard of living, not neglecting the need for a surplus of revenues over expenditures which can be used for debt reduction. We cannot expect such a surplus during periods of readjustment such as we experienced in 1958. But a surplus should be part of our fiscal program during periods of high and rising business activity. If it is not—if instead we adopt the philosophy that at no time in our history is anything more required of us than barely breaking even—we begin to cast reasonable doubt upon our willingness to accept the responsibilities which are ours.

To ignore the obligation of paying off some part of our debt during prosperous times is contrary to all of our American traditions of good faith and performance. Failure to reduce our debt when we can means passing on the problems of the debt to another generation, which we have no moral right to do. It also means foregoing the restraining effect of budget surpluses on the inflationary pressures that historically exist during periods of high activity. Budget surpluses are effective weapons in our arsenal; we cannot afford to ignore them.

The whole world is watching us closely. The countries who are new to democracy, in particular, are observing very carefully the extent to which we practice what we preach. On my trip to and from New Delhi last fall, for the annual meetings of the International Bank and Monetary Fund, I was impressed to discover how well informed foreign officials are about even the details of our fiscal attitudes and position.

As we face the problems of our day, we have the comforting realization that we have recently been able to achieve—not without effort—a rather high degree of price stability. The value of the dollar has not decreased in 12 months. The all-commodity index of wholesale prices has been substantially level. We have a substantial amount of unused capacity in basic industries.

Nevertheless, I must repeat that in a free economy there is never a complete absence of the inflationary or deflationary threat.

There are those who say that in this period of stability no voice should be raised about the dangers of inflation. There are those who say that the realities of the moment should shield us from the disturbing prospects of what future inflation might produce. There are those who say that if we warn against future dangers we are contributors to the inflationary process.

What would they have us do? Would they have us ignore the future consequences of what we now propose or do? Such a doctrine must be alien to those of you who have the responsibility of keeping the Nation informed as to the problems of today and equally alert to the problems of tomorrow.

As publishers and editors of the great newspapers of our Nation, you have more than a working familiarity with the difficulties and dangers involved in Government financing. By giving expression in realistic perspective to the whole panorama of viewpoints on these complex and unromantic areas of the news, you can help millions of Americans obtain a much-needed insight into the nature of our financial responsibilities as a nation.

The Treasury is willing and anxious to give all the help it can in supplying the facts. It is obvious, however, that we must refrain from making public information which is confidential under law, as well as giving out information which would be inappropriate in light of a pending financing or information which might improperly serve to promote speculation in any market. Within these limits we do make information available to the maximum limit.

The fact that fiscal matters are little understood—even by some rather prominent and otherwise well-informed people—was brought home to me one day when a visitor in my office remarked: "You talk of the dangers of monetization of the debt, Mr. Secretary. You know I just don't believe there is such a danger. Probably because I don't quite understand what monetization means."

I said this to my visitor: "Now suppose I wanted to write checks of $100 million starting tomorrow morning, but the Treasury was out of money. If I called up a bank and said, 'Will you loan me $100 million at 3½ percent for 6 months if I send you over a note to that effect,' the banker would probably say, 'Yes, I will.' "

"Where would he get the $100 million with which to credit the account of the U.S. Treasury? Would he take it from the account of someone else? No, certainly not. He would merely create that much money, subject to reserve requirements, by crediting our account in that sum and accepting the Government's note as an asset. When I had finished writing checks for $100 million the operation would have added that sum to the money supply. Now certainly that approaches the same degree of monetization as if I had called down to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and said, 'Please print me up $100 million worth of greenbacks which I can pay out tomorrow.' "

At this point my visitor broke in to say, "Oh, I would be against printing those greenbacks."

There are many lessons to be learned from the history—and particularly from the history of man's struggle to achieve and maintain human freedom. But one lesson stands out: Each generation must have the wisdom, the courage, and the toughness to accept the responsibilities which are uniquely theirs. If they do not—if difficult problems are pushed aside—the generations that follow will surely pay the price.

Alfred North Whitehead has said that every epoch has its character determined by the way its population reacts to the material events they encounter. They may rise to greatness—or they may collapse.

In writing of the Greeks and Romans, one of our greatest classical scholars summed up their story as follows: "In the end, more than they wanted freedom, they wanted security, a comfortable life, and they lost all—security and comfort and freedom. * * * When the Athenians finally wanted, not to give to the society, but the society to give to them, when the freedom they wished most for was freedom from responsibility, then Athens ceased to be free and was never free again."

Let us remember.

Let us remember, too, George Washington's admonition to the new American Republic. Liberty and self-government, he said, are "finally staked on the experiment entrusted to the hands of the American people."

The stark truth of Washington's statement is being underscored almost every day by events in the headlines. The imperialist programs of the Communist dictatorships represent the greatest challenge to freedom which the world has ever known. The success or failure of that challenge depends very largely on the choices of the American people. Our country will make the right choice; our freedom will be preserved.

RELEASE OF STOCKPILED COPPER

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, last Friday the Senate very wisely, by unanimous vote, adopted a resolution expressing its disapproval of a contemplated move by the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization to release stockpiled copper to the fabricating trade.

Subsequently, the Director of OCDM has publicly promised, and I quote him, "to exercise great care that our actions do not disrupt the market or adversely affect the industry involved."

In a thought-provoking editorial with the headline "The Copper Fiasco," the American Metal Market today observed:

> What happened in Washington last week should put us to work devising better machinery for handling copper than has yet been prescribed.

The editorial also points out "the American public has rightly been reluctant to have the Government operating in the market," and had the contemplated action been taken that is exactly what would have happened—the Government would have been operating in the market.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COPPER FIASCO

Time has repeatedly shown that one of the great weaknesses of representative government is the reluctance of legislatures and administrations to spell out essential but controversial procedures when to do so would risk a degree of unpopularity. One might even go further and say that the reluctance sometimes grows out of nervousness on the part of officials over possible resentment, when what is contemplated might not cause resentment at all.

This rather ridiculous situation was brought home last week when it became known that certain bureau officials had been quietly giving serious consideration to the sale of some 128,000 tons of copper, acquired under the still-uncompleted contracts made with copper producers as inducements to expand our copper production at the time of the Korean crisis.

As any neophyte in politics could have foretold, the idea, when it became known, immediately provoked loud outcries from congressional representatives of mining States. These, we may rest assured, were mere whispers to what would have been heard had sales taken place before the Senators and Congressmen got wind of what was going on, and they will still be like whispers if the bureaus persist despite the clearly established opposition which exists "on the Hill" and in the trade. All this is because we have lacked the foresight clearly to "lay down the law."

A more unhappy choice than copper could not have been selected for this action. Of all basic metals, copper is among the most volatile pricewise. It is common knowledge that leaders of the industry were already rightly concerned over the harm done their business by frequent wide and unpredictable price swings. This sensitiveness has been in marked contrast with the stability of the metal's chief rival, aluminum. For the bureaus to have given serious consideration to the sale of large stocks was certain to have caused pronounced jitters in a market which, only a few months ago, was so much in the doldrums that the Senate approved absorbing 150,000 tons for the stockpile, and which is only now about regaining its equilibrium. The proposal was certain to have "upset the applecart" and provoked the comment that "the matter had been inexpertly handled."

But, of course, merely to criticize this blooper falls far short of providing the serious consideration which the situation deserves. The American public has rightly been reluctant to have the Government "operating" in the market. For that very good reason, it was provided, when the stockpiling of materials was authorized, that only the President could release materials in time of emergency, and only Congress in time of peace. These provisions apply only to materials formally incorporated into the stockpile; large quantities of materials—like the 128,000 tons of copper are, however, owned by the Government outside the stockpile, and, as this incident demonstrates, have been left as loose ends. Why don't we face that issue?

The locking up of all such materials in the stockpile is not necessarily the only solution, or even the best that could be devised. Paradoxically, the tin industry has pointed the way to what might well be a much better approach. What has been done by other nations for tin, might well be considered by us not only for copper, but for other accumulated stocks. We say paradoxically because, while the United States has entered into international agreements on wheat and sugar, it has refused to be a party to the international tin agreement, although we are by far the largest consumer (and stockpiler) of tin in the world. Nevertheless, we may well learn from the operation of that agreement how best to meet the problems of what to do with our enormous quantities of other materials, problems which are only now beginning to bother us.

The tin agreement has the great merit of establishing beforehand the precise price levels at which accumulated stocks may and must be offered for sale. No one anywhere need by surprised to encounter offerings of tin from the "buffer stock" if the price for the metal reaches and rises above certain prespecified levels. This is in marked contrast with what the bureau officials were planning to do with copper, as well as with the complete insulation of such inventories in the strategic stockpile, as proposed by some who understandably disagree with the possible surreptitious feeding of stocks to the market at whatever levels bureau heads might choose. Rather than not establishing whether the markets would, or would not, be called upon to absorb any part of Government stocks, a procedure modeled on that for tin, would give advance notice of offerings, and the levels at which they could be made.

Let it be recalled that excessively high prices are as bad for copper as they are for any other commodity. We know the pressure to which the Government has been subjected to support copper when large surpluses have coincided with low prices. We know the absurd heights reached in 1956 following the absorption of 100,000 tons of Chilean copper in 1954. We can imagine what the price would be today if, last year, we had absorbed another 150,000 tons as proposed by the Senate. The one way to avoid the boom that would insure a following bust would be to serve notice of the availability of Government owned materials at levels which are obviously excessive. Stocks so liquidated would thus serve a doubly useful purpose. What happened in Washington last week should put us to work devising better machinery for handling copper than has yet been prescribed. One fiasco should be enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is S. 1555.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], striking out title VI in the bill.

The Senator from North Carolina has 1 hour and 7 minutes remaining for debate, and the majority leader has 1 hour and 22 minutes remaining in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished junior Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. I wish briefly to explain my reason for so doing. I would have preferred to have an opportunity to vote on title V of the administration's bill, S. 748, which includes Taft-Hartley Act amendments, and which also includes practically all the Taft-Hartley amendments contained in title VI of the pending bill. In addition to those contained in title VI, there is also a prohibition against secondary boycotts and against blackmail or recognition picketing.

Mr. President, my chief concern with the deficiencies of title VI of the pending bill rests on the fact that the amendments proposed by title VI do not touch upon these very important fields. The amendments ignore these fields completely.

If the Ervin amendment should prevail, I suggest that the Senate would then be in a mood to vote no Taft-Hartley Act amendments at this time. We could then proceed with the admonitions of the blue ribbon committee, at a time when they were ready to suggest to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, and enter the very important and controversial field of Taft-Hartley Act amendments separately.

If the Ervin amendment shall be defeated, I am afraid we will be here for a long, long time, because such action will open the door to all conceivable amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. I am certain that controversial fields such as section 14(b) will be gone into. I am sure that amendments will be proposed in the utility fields. I can very well imagine spending days and days on this one title, namely, title VI.

I said yesterday that I would be perfectly willing to consider only two amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, namely, amendments dealing with the boycott and picketing fields, and excluding everything else from consideration until a later time. Of course, we were not able to come to any agreement on such a proposal.

If we were able to follow that course, I am sure we would be able to vote such amendments up or down, and then, by agreement, not go into any other areas of the Taft-Hartley Act until such time as the blue ribbon committee has reported, and we would then be able to act intelligently.

Mr. President, I feel very strongly about the need for a prohibition against secondary boycotts and recognition picketing. If my tally of the possible vote on the Ervin amendment means anything, the vast majority of the members of the McClellan committee will go along with the Ervin amendment. I am not certain as to how the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] will vote, but I feel relatively sure that he might leave us on this proposal. However, to me the prospect is an indication that the Senators who have been very closely associated with this problem for the past 2 years recognize that every effective labor reform bill must go into the areas of secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing.

Mr. President, there appeared before our committee Mr. Godfrey P. Schmidt, one of the three court-appointed monitors of the Teamsters Union, and in a letter addressed to the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and entered as a part of his testimony, Mr. Schmidt made a statement in regard to these two fields which I should like to read to my colleagues. It is particularly important because it comes from a man who lives with the the problem day after day. I quote paragraph 3 from Mr. Schmidt's letter:

> 3. From my conversations with rank and file workers, I am persuaded that they are as convinced as I am that no labor reform can be effectuated unless recognitional and organizational picketing is banned. Your prohibition of blackmail picketing is completely inadequate. In the first place, it neglects the rather obvious fact that your proposed section 8(b)7 (p. 48 of your bill) could very easily be evaded. In the second place, your language makes enforcement all but impossible. I see no reason why the coercive thrust of the picket line should be permitted to be used to prevent free choice of bargaining agents, which is supposed to be central to the labor relations policy of this country. When you questioned me on this point you were concerned with the plight of Puerto Rican workers who were being exploited by employers by means of low wages and bad working conditions. So am I. But such situations are far more rare, in my opinion, than the situation with which I am concerned, namely: the repeated instances of back-door agreements between corrupt or dictatorial labor leaders and employers, both of whom turn their backs on employees' wishes. Moreover, the case of the exploited worker can easily be handled by the traditional organizational methods which have made unionism great for many years past.

He went on further in his letter to discuss other points. However, I feel that the most pertinent point, next to what he says about picketing, is the one dealing with the need for regulation in the field of secondary boycotts.

I should like to read the fourth paragraph of the letter to which I have already referred. It is a short one:

> 4. Since the irresponsible power of labor leaders needs curbing (it is this power which gives them the opportunity to play dictator), secondary boycotts, which is a source of this power, must be limited. (The original intention of those who framed the Taft-Hartley law has been betrayed or frustrated by a whole series of Board and court decisions.) I think the administration bill's provisions in this respect should be incorporated in your bill. With growing impertinence, labor leaders dragoon neutrals into participation in their labor disputes. We need the rational limitation which the administration bill provides. I am not impressed by the argument that corrupt practices should be remedied by one bill and labor relations by another bill. What you must strike at is the source of untrammeled power exercised by labor leaders. You must submit that power to reasonable and civilized regulation. Most of the corrupt practices revealed by the McClellan committee have been made possible, against the wishes of the decent rank and file majority, precisely because union leaders have held at the head of the worker several cocked guns: (a) compulsory unionism without any effective intraunion bill of rights; (b) organizational and recognitional picketing; and (c) the secondary boycott bloated to the unconscionable grab for power now permitted by the Board and the courts.

Mr. President, it will be necessary for us to come to grips with this problem sooner or later. If the Kennedy-Ervin bill is passed in substantially the form it now is, it will not deal with this problem. It will only mean that the American people will be hoodwinked once again. Sooner or later they will get wise to us in the Congress and will demand that we get at the root of the problem which is found in the operations of certain labor unions today.

Godfrey Schmidt hit the nail on the head when he said the problem was power. If anyone were to ask me to reduce the 2 years of hearings and the millions of words spoken in them to one word, it would say: Power.

When we are getting only at the symptoms of the disease, and not reaching the disease itself, I suggest that we are not doing a complete job; we are neglecting our responsibilities as U.S. Senators, not only to ourselves and to the Constitution, but, most importantly, to the American people.

If the Ervin amendment prevails, I should say, as I said before, that it is an indication that the Senate is not desirous at this time of discussing any other Taft-Hartley amendments.

If the Ervin amendment fails, then I feel, as I said before, that Taft-Hartley amendments will come flowing in like the sunshine does in my native State of Arizona; they will be all over the place. We must deal with the weapons which have been placed in the hands of Jimmy Hoffa. We must take his guns away, or they will remain cocked at the heads of working people, at the heads of small businessmen, at the heads of the public—yes, and I might suggest at the heads of the union movement itself; because the American people, in spite of what Congress fails to do, will not continue to allow this abusive use of power in the United States. Power in the hands of the corporations was curbed when it got too strong. It was curbed when it got too big in areas of government. Sooner or later, because it is getting too big, the power of labor unions will likewise be curbed.

I shall not detain the Senate too long in this discussion. I believe everyone knows how I feel about this matter. I have served on the McClellan committee since the day it first went into operation. I have attended as many of its meetings as I could attend. I have read the transcript of those hearings which I could not attend. I am convinced beyond any question in my mind that if we do not approach the field of secondary boycotts and picketing, we shall not have a workable labor reform bill.

I shall vote for the Ervin amendment for two reasons: First, in the hope that the Ervin amendment, if it prevails, will admonish the Senate: Let us wait for the recommendations of the blue ribbon committee. I went along with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] on the creation of the blue ribbon committee. I think they are carefully picked men. They are tops in their field; they have represented labor, management, and the public. They still do. I should like to wait to see what they suggest before we move into the field of amending the Taft-Hartley law. I had hoped the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts would join me in that desire and express to the Senate the view that we should not now consider amending the Taft-Hartley law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arizona has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I was in the process of rather wishfully hoping that the Senator from Massachusetts might proceed a little further in the reasoning which he and I have followed to some degree, namely, that action on Taft-Hartley amendments be deferred until such time as we can hear from the blue ribbon committee; or, in the absence of that, that he heed my once again made plea that we consider only the areas of secondary boycotts and picketing. If he would agree to do that, I would agree to drop title VI and title V. I do not expect him to do that, but I wanted to go on record as having made that proposal.

I intend to vote for the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina. I hope many of my colleagues will join with me in doing so.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 1 minute.

I appreciate the proposal made by the Senator from Arizona. It is, of course, a proposal to trade an apple for an orchard. He is not giving away anything in which he is interested. We have in the bill title VI, which has been carefully thought out. The Senator from Arizona wants us to strike out title VI and consider only two items—boycotts and picketing.

It seems to me that the position which some Senators have taken, which is to strike out title VI and not make any adjustments of the Taft-Hartley Act has the virtue of consistency. It is my understanding that that is the position which the Senator from North Carolina has taken.

If we do not strike out title VI, I understand amendments will be offered to the Taft-Hartley act, and that such amendments will be carefully debated. But the position of the Senator from Arizona is that he wants to have title VI stricken out, and then to open up Taft-Hartley act, particularly the provisions relating to boycotting and picketing. I do not understand how Senators on this side of the aisle could be expected to accept that viewpoint.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I made two proposals. One was to go along with the plan we have discussed while waiting for the suggestions of the blue ribbon committee. In view of the fact that that committee is approaching some conclusions, we might wait for them and come to some type of agreement, such as we had last year, when, by arrangements made between the Senator from Massachusetts and the majority leader, a positive date was set when a bill would be before the Senate. As I recall, that date was June 12.

If we could discuss some such arrangement as that, I am sure Senators would be perfectly willing to drop their insistence on title V, title VI, secondary boycotts and picketing.

I say let us wait. It might be another 2 months; it might be, as I suggested to the Senator from Massachusetts, in the next session. I am not in such a rush that I want to hurry the blue ribbon committee. So my proposals were really two in number.

What I am really attempting to do is to forestall long debate and arguments on the floor, which I feel certain will ensue, when amendment after amendment is offered to the Taft-Hartley law, and we start to do again precisely what the Senator from Massachusetts has objected to many times, namely, write a labor bill on the floor of the Senate without benefit of hearings. That is my concern in the matter.

It might not sound consistent with my desires to go into the fields of secondary boycotts and picketing; but if I could have the assurance of the chairman of my subcommittee that we would have that backed up by a day positive, and that backed up in turn by the majority leader, I think we could come to a very quick and happy solution of the matter. If the Senator from Massachusetts would like to entertain such a suggestion, not on the time of the Senate—we could retire to the cloakroom—I should be very happy to discuss it further with him.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

I said to the blue ribbon committee, when it was created, that it was my intention to press for action on their report as soon as it was filed. That is still my intention. I myself am committed to report a second bill to the Senate. I will make every effort to do so. I am delighted that the Senator from Arizona feels the same way. I do not believe we have finished the whole job of labor-management reform by this one bill.

I think we have done the job of reform fairly well. But other things must be dealt with; and I hope it will be possible for the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to report another bill to the Senate, certainly in this Congress, if not at this session, which will deal with the overall problems which have arisen during the 12 years the Taft-Hartley Act has been in effect.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts agree with me that we might reach a positive approach to this matter? What I am trying to reach, by means of this exchange, is an agreement or understanding that, following the vote on the Ervin amendment—and I sincerely hope the Ervin amendment will be adopted—all amendments dealing with the Taft-Hartley Act shall be considered in a separate bill, to be brought before the Senate later at this session, and thus have the Senate act at this time on all the other parts of the pending bill which both the Senator from Massachusetts and I agree must be enacted.

Mr. KENNEDY. Of course I am not in a position to bind the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare; neither am I able to bind the Labor Subcommittee. As my colleague realizes, there is no previous-question rule or rule of germaneness; and thus it is never possible for the chairman to make a commitment, for the subcommittee, that no amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act will be dealt with at this time.

But as chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor, I will say that it is my firm intention, in order to keep faith with the blue ribbon committee, to bring to the floor of the Senate, as soon as the hearings have been held, proposed legislation which will deal with the overall problems of the Taft-Hartley Act. That is my hope, and I will do all I can to achieve such an end.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Last year, through the combined efforts of the Senator from Massachusetts and the majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] we got the labor bill on the floor of the Senate. I feel certain that if, somehow, in the next few minutes or few hours the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], and possibly the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]—and I would be perfectly willing to make myself a party to the meeting—got together, we might come to a conclusion which would, in effect, remove the roadblock from in front of this bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator from Arizona was then convinced that such a second bill could be gotten through this Congress, would he then vote against the boycott and picketing amendments which have been proposed?

Mr. GOLDWATER. So far as I know, they are not now before the Senate. I have not seen them. So I am not in a position to say whether I would or would not.

But I will say that if we could decide on a positive date, I would be very, very generous in my attitude in regard to my present position, because what I want to have happen is exactly what the Senator from Massachusetts desires—namely, a workable, honest labor-reform bill.

What disturbs me is to hear my own colleagues who have joined with the Senator from Massachusetts and other colleagues all over this floor say, "Well, this bill does not go far enough; we know that. But it is a step in the right direction."

The problem now before us is one of such monstrous proportions that I believe we need to deal with it by more than one step. If we could act later in the field of amending the Taft-Hartley Act, and could do so in an atmosphere different from the present one, so that we would then deal with proposals which the blue-ribbon committee itself either might have proposed or might not have proposed—I refer to highly controversial proposals which, if acted on in connection with the pending bill, would delay for 2 or 3 weeks our action on it—I would go along with such a suggestion.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Arizona is the ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I think both of us will use our best efforts to bring such a bill to the floor during this Congress.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Then I hope we can reach a conclusion to drop from consideration in connection with the pending measure all proposed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, and to let them wait until the blue ribbon committee reports.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I wish to thank the able and distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] for his very valuable contributions to the debate on this amendment.

Before I yield time to the able and distinguished junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina realize that if he now suggests the absence of a quorum, the time required for the quorum call will have to be charged to the time available to his side?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well.

The absence of a quorum has been suggested; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the able and distinguished junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, legislative issues are seldom as simple and uncomplicated as we would like them to be. In the pending bill and in the amendments which have been offered, or will be offered to it these issues assume an undue confusion.

A Senator's record, in the common acceptance of that term, namely, his votes on controversial legislation, can readily be distorted to a public which has been taught to look for the slogan issue, the capsule news, and the key vote.

So it is with the bill before us. I am aware that this explanation of my reasons for supporting the pending amendment will be little heeded or remembered. But I have received many communications, including a fistful of telegrams which have come this morning from union leaders in Idaho, adverse to the pending amendment. So I feel obliged to make public my conclusions with respect to the pending amendment and the other major amendments anticipated.

Mr. President, I hardly need to say that I am a friend and supporter of organized labor. The rank and file of labor is the rank and file of America; and the leaders of organized labor, with few exceptions, seek progress, prosperity, and peace for our Nation, as honorably and devotedly as do any leaders of industry, agriculture, or government. So I have never hesitated to support organized labor when I felt it to be right. Likewise, I shall never hesitate to oppose organized labor when I feel it to be wrong.

With these considerations in mind, I wish to state briefly the position I shall take with respect to the pending measure.

As a member of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, I feel a special responsibility to urge the Senate to take effective action now, in the interest of management and labor, and most especially in the public interest, to purge the labor movement of an alien, malign, and parasitic infestation.

Under the able chairmanship of the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], this committee has systematically exposed the sordid facts of corruption, racketeering, and unbridled personal power in the Teamsters' Union and in certain other parts of the labor movement. Month after month I have sat with the committee, assisting in the interrogation of a parade of gangsters, thugs, and hoodlums—and their victims—who have been called to testify before us. Many of these racketeers are feasting upon the earnings of honest working men and women. The exposure of these robber barons was long overdue, and I am proud to have had a role to play in exposing them.

Clearly something must be done. Last year, with only one dissenting vote, the Senate passed a measure which, in its collective judgment, would have helped to correct many evils exposed by the select committee. But that bill failed to pass the House of Representatives. Now the Labor and Public Welfare Committee has again reported a bill which reflects a thorough review of the select committee's hearings and findings and contains carefully drawn provisions to help free the labor movement from sinister underworld influences. It is an antiracketeering, not an antilabor, bill. Insofar as it deals with racketeering, I believe it will do much good. I have cosponsored it, and I intend to support it.

While there is very wide agreement about the provisions of the bill aimed at the racketeers, many of the amendments which have been proposed to the pending measure are highly complex and controversial. Because I feel strongly that the urgent need is to pass a measure which can be approved in the other body and become law at this session, I do not anticipate that I will support amendments which may compromise that objective.

When the Senate has passed its judgment upon an antiracketeering bill, I hope it will turn to a consideration of needed revisions in our basic laws governing the relations between labor and management. The Taft-Hartley Act has not been amended in its major features since its enactment in 1947. Time and experience under the act have shown that changes are needed. This is, however, an exceedingly complex and a highly difficult field. I expect the Labor and Public Welfare Committee to hold appropriate hearings to avail itself of the most expert advice and to report to the Senate its recommendations for revisions of the present Labor-Management Relations Act. Only in this manner, it seems to me, can the Senate discharge its responsibility to deal constructively with these sensitive problems. Therefore, I will oppose any attempt hastily to engraft upon the antiracketeering bill now before us amendments, whether they seem good or bad, which are foreign to its clearly defined objectives. To do so would increase the risk that no bill at all will get through both Houses of Congress.

This might create a political issue, as, I might say, an effort was made to create one in the last session; but certainly it would not cure the malignancy which now afflicts the labor movement. For my part, I prefer to work for sound and constructive legislation in both fields.

This brings me to a consideration of the special problem posed by the Ervin amendment to strike title VI from the bill. This title contains a number of amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. It is significant, I think, that these amendments do not bear directly upon the problem of racketeering. It is significant also that most of them have been long urged, and are now welcomed, by the principal spokesmen for organized labor. Finally, it is significant that the bill contains none of the amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act which are opposed by organized labor.

I do not say that these amendments are wrong, nor that in a proper place I would not support them, but I can find no escape from the proposition that they do not belong in this bill. It is an antiracketeering bill; they do not deal with racketeering. If they are in fact noncontroversial, they can be offered separately, and readily passed by both Houses of Congress. If in fact they are controversial, this is not the place or the time to consider them. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has stated that changes in the basic laws relating to labor-management relations are needed; that the Labor Committee has obtained the services of a panel of distinguished experts to assist it in the preparation of legislation to accomplish these changes, and that we may expect the results of these labors to be presented to the Senate at a later date. I have every confidence that this will be done, and I believe that it is in the context of such a later bill that the Senate should deal generally with amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act which are not related to our present objective—purging labor of racketeers.

Mr. President, I believe the position I am taking is fair to labor, that it is fair to management, and that it is in the public interest. Senators know that other major changes to the Taft-Hartley Act will be offered as amendments to this bill. I expect to vote against them—and I expect to do this even though some amendments are offered which, on their merits, I would approve. I will do this because I think there must be a clear separation between antiracketeering legislation, on the one hand, and modifications of the Taft-Hartley Act, on the other, if we are to deal constructively with either group of problems. For this same reason, I shall vote for the Ervin amendment to strike from the pending bill the title VI amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. President, I shall say one thing more, and I shall try to speak plainly. If I understand correctly the temper of the country, it would be well to avoid the pitfalls which lie in the path of this antiracketeering bill. The McClellan committee has been exposing intolerable conditions for 2½ years. The racketeers have got to go. If it is true that most responsible labor leaders are willing to accept the degree of public control over union affairs which this bill entails, I say this is precisely what the public has a right to expect of them. It is the public interest which has been violated. That the violators are few in number and enemies alike of the public at large and honest workingmen, is all the more reason for responsible labor leaders to support this bill. Every day that passes without action here in the Congress strengthens the hand of those who would club to death our free, democratic labor unions on the pretext of exterminating racketeers. If this bill fails to pass, with or without title VI, I hope its death may never be laid at the door of responsible labor leaders, lest it one day be said of them: "They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind."

Mr. President, I yield back to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina my remaining time.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I wish to thank the able and distinguished junior Senator from Idaho for his magnificent contribution to this debate. As a member of the Senate Rackets Committee and as a cosponsor of the pending bill, he has rendered a signal service to all the American people.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may make some insertions in the RECORD?

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time to be used by the able and distinguished Senator from Wisconsin not be charged against the time of those advocating the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] be permitted to address the Senate without the time being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INVEST-IN-AMERICA WEEK—AMERICA'S FIFTH ANNUAL CELEBRATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the traditional initiative and resourcefulness which were characteristic of the Founding Fathers of this great Nation are still an important part of the life of the American people today. In no segment of our economic and social life is this fact more nearly true than in the field of competitive enterprise; for it is here that the continued supply of the public's funds is absolutely essential—with sound investments in jobs, in savings, homes, insurance, and in sound securities.

Next Sunday, April 26, will be observed all over the United States as the opening date for the nationwide observance of the Fifth Annual Invest-in-America Week. This year the occasion will have particular significance; for, since last year's celebration of the Fourth Annual Invest-in-America Week, the overall economy of our country has happily experienced a marked upsurge from the problems of a period of discouraging recession. With characteristic optimism, the American people rolled up their sleeves and went to work; earnings and savings were invested to the benefit of hundreds of thousands of citizens, with the result that the American competitive system has produced the highest standard of living in history.

The objectives of the National Invest-in-America Committee, Inc., with headquarters in Philadelphia, is best summed up in the statement of its principles:

> The American competitive enterprise system was founded on the work and savings of the people and has produced the highest standard of living in history. Our people, of their own free will, have made all forms of investment from Government bonds to venture capital for new enterprise. Competitive enterprise is dependent on the continued supply of these funds, which benefit consumers, workers, and the national interest; as well as investors. Investing in America has helped make our country great. This idea needs to be brought home to all the people—men, women, and schoolchildren.

The outstanding work of this committee was recognized last year by President Eisenhower's message to the chairman of the Washington Invest-in-America Committee, in which he said:

> The annual observance of Invest-in America Week is a good time to reaffirm our belief in the power of work, savings and investments to create new business and better job opportunities for all our citizens. With effort and enterprise we will continue to advance the economic growth of our land. Congratulations to those engaged in making known the fullest meaning of Invest-in-America Week.

I have been pleased on several occasions to commend the national sponsors of Invest-in-America Week, along with all the many local groups throughout the land, as well as to invite the attention of my colleagues to the important way in which we can keep America strong by keeping our economy growing. I was happy to call attention to the third annual observance in March 1957, as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 3, page 3668; and then again to comment on the fourth celebration of Invest-in-America Week on April 29, 1958, as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 6, page 7570. At the close of that week, it was my pleasure to be the host at a reception in the old Supreme Court chamber, in the Capitol, honoring the national Invest-in-America officers and Washington Invest-in-America Committee members. Present were many of my colleagues in the Senate and House of Representatives, as well as leaders of the executive agencies in the Government and local business and civic leaders. Among the speakers at this reception were Julian Baird, Under Secretary of the Treasury; Edward Gadsby, Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission; Albert Cole, Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency; Frederic Potts, of Philadelphia, chairman of the board of the National Invest-in-America Committee; and Barnum Colton, president of the National Bank of Washington and chairman of the Capital Invest-in-America group.

Next Monday, April 27, there will be a kickoff luncheon here in our Nation's Capital initiating the fifth annual celebration of Invest-in-America activities. Again it will be my pleasure to welcome fellow Senators and Representatives and to greet members of the National Invest-in-America Committee and local leaders in business and in the executive branch. At this luncheon there will be addresses by outstanding individuals, who will dramatize the principles of this constructive program and will stimulate interest in year-round activities.

Mr. President, the Invest-in-America program has ably demonstrated that it is a solid growth enterprise. In less than a decade, the organization—which was originally inspired by an editorial in the Investment Dealer's Digest in 1949—has taken root and grown steadily to the point that some 207 communities in the United States and the Hawaiian Islands participated last spring in Invest-in-America activities. In my own State of Wisconsin, Mayor Frank Zeidler officially opened Invest-in-America Week with a proclamation which stated, in part:

> By an adequate and intelligent program of personal savings and investment, each of us will be able to add immeasurably to our own personal welfare by stimulating production of wealth and hence prosperity for our Nation.

All over the State there was generous support from its businesses; and radio, press, TV, posters, and lobby exhibits carried the message to citizens of the Badger State.

This year, in order to expand Invest-in-America activities in Wisconsin, there was organized a State Committee composed of representatives from the Wisconsin Bankers Association, Wisconsin Manufacturers Association, the Wisconsin Chamber of Commerce, insurance companies, and investment brokers. Named chairman of the State Invest-in-America Committee was Mr. Roth S. Schleck, an able and industrious vice president of the First Wisconsin National Bank, in Milwaukee. At the conclusion of my statement, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a letter I recently received from Mr. Schleck, together with a listing of the members of the Wisconsin Invest-in-America Committee.

In order to build a bigger and better future for America, it is necessary that the savings of the American people, in the form of retained earnings of corporations, as well as individual savings, provide the capital. A million new jobs a year call for at least $14,000 of new capital investment per job; which means $14 billion a year. And at least another $20 billion will be needed to maintain the plants and machinery providing the 66 million present jobs. America's future is worth working for because the past has shown that no other economic and political system produces the blessings we enjoy. In the words of one of the slogans of Invest-in-America: "Let every proud American become a missionary for the principle of a free America. Tell the world, 'I am a capitalist. I invest in America.' "

I send to the desk several items. The first is an article from a recent issue of the Milwaukee Journal which points up the steps being taken in Wisconsin toward observance of the fifth annual Invest-in-America Week. The second item is the previously-mentioned communication received from Mr. Roth Schleck, together with a listing of the Wisconsin Invest-in-America Committee. The third item is an outstanding article by Mr. Robert M. Joline, who is on the board of State governors for the National League of Insured Savings Associations, entitled "Why You Should Support the Invest-in-America Program"; as printed in the National Savings and Loan Journal. And finally, as an indication of the high caliber of citizen on the National Invest-in-America Committee, I also include a listing of the officers and board of governors of this fine organization for 1959; together with a listing of the cities which are charter members of Invest-in-America. I ask unanimous consent that these items be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles, letters, and lists were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INVEST-IN-AMERICA GROUP PLANS STATE-WIDE EFFORT

Wisconsin observance of "Invest-in-America week," a Nationwide program which has received scant attention outside Milwaukee in previous years, will be cultivated more extensively in 1959 and future years.

That was the agreement reached Thursday at a meeting here of a newly formed Wisconsin Invest-in-America week committee. Composed of leading representatives of the securities business, banking and insurance, the committee elected officers at a Wisconsin club meeting.

Roth S. Schleck, a vice president of the First Wisconsin National Bank of Milwaukee, was elected chairman. James A. Swoboda, resident partner in Paine, Webber, Jackson & Curtis, Milwaukee, was chosen secretary, and J. Victor Loewi, president of Loewi & Co., Inc., Milwaukee, was named treasurer.

THEY HAVE A STAKE

The week will be observed nationally April 26 through May 2. Schleck pointed out that it is not a 1-week promotion of investment but is chiefly an educational effort and a rededication to the purpose of the week: To help Americans understand how their earnings and savings can be put to work for their own best advantage.

"Many people don't realize they have a stake in the capitalistic system, such as represented in a pension fund," Schleck noted.

Swoboda emphasized that the week was not "and should not become self-serving for the financial institutions; that it should adhere to the broad objectives of the program."

Community committees in Milwaukee and other State cities will plan programs calling attention to the week. While these may not reach desired stature this year, they will lay a foundation for improved observances in future years, Schleck said.

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Because of your interest in the purpose of Invest-in-America which you so ably demonstrated in your statement to the Senate last year, I believe you will be pleased to know that, in order to expand our activities in this State, we have organized a State committee composed of representatives from the Wisconsin Bankers Association, Wisconsin Manufacturers Association, the Wisconsin Chamber of Commerce, insurance companies, and investment brokers.

WHY YOU SHOULD SUPPORT THE INVEST-IN-AMERICA PROGRAM

(By Robert M. Joline, National League Governor for Pennsylvania)

Invest-in-America is an effective means of bringing home to every American that our way of life—the free competitive enterprise system—provides the highest living standard the world has ever known.

Through Invest-in-America's continuous educational program more people are learning that, when a person opens a savings account, buys a home or a life insurance policy, owns a Government bond or share of stock, he becomes a part of the great American capitalist system.

Since its beginning in 1949, the Invest-in-America effort has grown to where communities in nearly every State and Hawaii now participate in activities designed to make us more aware of the role savers and investors play in assuring the abundant life we enjoy.

Invest-in-America Week, to be observed April 26 through May 2, is the big stimulant to year-round activities. In 1958, over 200 cities from coast-to-coast conducted appropriate observances to remind Americans that it takes investment in jobs, savings, insurance, homes, and securities to keep our Nation strong.

In Philadelphia, where the Invest-in-America activities originated, our Federal Savings & Loan Group has taken an active part in this development by giving time and thought and contributing funds. Our group's participation in Invest-in-America Week has been reflected, too, in cooperative newspaper advertising, in the sponsorship of radio-television information panels, in office windows and counter poster displays, and in other ways calculated to reach the public.

All business, and the savings and loan business in particular, should take advantage of every opportunity to combat economic illiteracy and help broaden understanding of the saving-investing process.

The Invest-in-America movement presents such an opportunity for constructive action. Savings and loan people in all parts of the country should further the effort by stimulating interest in Invest-in-America Week and assisting in observances this year. Our people will discover additional advantages in a coordinated effort with chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, junior achievement, industry, school systems, banks, securities firms, and insurance organizations.

Our own experience in Philadelphia strongly indicates that the spreading Invest-in-America philosophy helps more and more Americans to understand better the workings of our economy—an economy that draws its strength from the private accumulation of capital.

The goal of the National Invest-in-America Committee, Inc., with headquarters in Philadelphia, is to broaden the observance to more communities and to utilize more fully the support which can be rallied from groups like ours, groups which share our concern in conveying to the public this vital message.

The committee's objective is best summed up in the following statement of principles:

"The American competitive enterprise was founded on the work and savings of the people and has produced the highest standard of living in history. Our people of their own free will have made all forms of investment from Government bonds to venture capital for free enterprise.

"Competitive enterprise is dependent on the continued supply of these funds which benefit consumers, workers, and the national interest as well as investors. Investing in America has helped make our country great."

The need for the Invest-in-America movement is just as urgent as when the first local programs were begun 10 years ago. Progress has been made, but basic misunderstanding of our economic system still exists.

In pointing out that every American is an investor, that savings and investment are the life stream of competitive enterprise and the source of more and better jobs for Americans, we are performing a service for not only contemporary America but for those to whom we must pass our Nation's affairs in years to come.

Invest-in-America is most important because it deals with fundamentals that everybody should understand. It has excellent slogans: "Money at work means men at work," "Invest in America for more and better jobs," and "Finance is the life stream of competitive enterprise." Now that is language that is concise, that people know and understand. In supporting a program which will teach people to save and shoulder their responsibilities, we stand to accomplish a great deal.

If the idea can be impressed upon each person that he is a part of our economy, it will be a factor for his own good and for the good of the Nation.

There are a number of useful tools available to help do the job. Through I-in-A national and local committee activities people get simple facts about the role of saving and investment in providing jobs. A colorful information kit is made available by the National Invest-in-America Committee to local committees, press, radio and television stations, and to private companies. In each kit are newspaper advertisements, color poster and window streamer, I-in-A messages which can be broadcast over office communications systems or posted on employee bulletin boards, a sticker and emblem, illustrated brochures and other material.

Savings and loan leaders in Philadelphia and other cities are joining forces with the financial, business, and industrial community to promote Invest-in-America Week. Talks by recognized civic and business leaders are featured. Radio, television, newspapers, and magazines carry the I-in-A message to millions of individuals. Company publications, billboards, street banners and posters hail Invest-in-America Week. Schools, churches, youth groups, service clubs, and civic organizations take part in this outstanding event. During Invest-in-America Week every citizen is encouraged to recount for himself the benefits that are his because he is an American.

Every person in a job and everyone with savings invested in a home or business has a need to protect his job and his investment. If an increasing proportion of our neighbors can be interested in the ownership of a home or some share of business, there will automatically be created a force whose interest will more nearly coincide with the interest of the financial and industrial community. The more and wider the savings—and the investments of savings in homes and in the businesses and enterprises of America—the greater will be our security.

What better investment is there for savings and loan businessmen, from a monetary point of view, than to participate in the Invest-in-America program and to push it year round? I am certain they will find it as rewarding as I have found it. And I am sure that everyone else who has been connected with Invest-in-America has found this to have been a satisfying experience.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall vote against striking title VI from the bill. Fundamentally, my reason is that the Taft-Hartley law amendments which are to be made are desirable, are generally agreed upon, or are of a character which should be generally agreed upon, and should be made now while we have the bill before us, rather than later.

I have been listening to the debate with great interest, this morning particularly, and I find that the opposition to including title VI in the bill is not substantive, as we lawyers say, but is climatic. In other words, what is alleged is that there will be a climate created around the bill which will induce other Taft-Hartley Act amendments to come forward, whereas if we strike title VI there will be no such climate.

Mr. President, with all due respect to my colleagues, I say that is an unsubstantial argument. Indeed, I do not think it makes any sense at all, for the reason that there is no rule of germaneness. Any Senator can offer an amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act if he wants to do so. He can talk about it for as long as he desires. He can press for a vote. If it appears that he has sufficient support, he can ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

It will make no difference whether we strike title VI. One hundred and thirty-five amendments have been printed, Mr. President, and there is nothing on earth to prevent every one of the Senators who has amendments from offering every one of them, whether we strike title VI or not.

I respectfully submit that even if we strike title VI, we will not inhibit any Senator, except those who have spoken to the subject, and they are relatively a small number.

What are the reasons for including title VI in the bill? One reason for including it is that it deals right now, instead of 6 or 8 months or a year from now, with some very essential matters upon which there is or should be general agreement, and it does not take anything away from the present law, but adds things which are not now in it.

Mr. President, let us evaluate the situation in terms of the facts. First, title VI deals with the no-man's land. Right now the no-man's land is vacant, and there is nothing filling it in whatever. At least in title VI there is an attempt to have a little fill-in; that is, by providing for agreements between the National Labor Relations Board and those States—of which there are 12—which have labor relations laws themselves. That would not take anything away from the law now. It would not compromise the position of those who think the National Labor Relations Board ought to have labor relations matters in its complete control, or of those who think some questions should go to the State courts and to the State agencies administering their own laws.

Such a procedure would keep the fundamental situation as it is now, but would allow a little more amplitude, and let more States get into the situation, in order to cut down the caseload. I ask Senators, what is wrong with that?

The second provision is with regard to the building and construction workers. Everyone agrees on that matter. At least, everyone has said so time and time again. We cannot apply the Taft-Hartley law to the building and construction field. We all know the law is not being applied in that field, and we might as well recognize the fact in the law. This is an essential amendment, and the sooner we adopt it the better.

Third, there is an attempt to deal with voting in representation cases of economic strikers. The sole question is one of whether economic strikers shall be entitled to vote in representation elections, or whether only those who filled the jobs in a strike shall be entitled to vote.

Mr. President, the President of the United States and most of the people of the country have generally concluded that economic strikers ought to be entitled to vote, and the sooner we make such provision the better in terms of labor peace and the freedom of the workingmen themselves.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the Senator define what he means by economic strikers?

Mr. JAVITS. I will. Economic strikers are the strikers who engage in a strike which is for union organization, or which is for better terms and conditions or in connection with negotiation of a new union contract when the previous contract has expired. This does not refer to a striker who, because of unfair labor practices on the part of the employer, is entitled by law to reinstatement.

That is what I mean by an economic striker.

Mr. President, I point out there is a great area of agreement between the prounion people and the President of the United States, representing a sort of the middle-of-the-road attitude in this matter, and I think perhaps the best we can say is that those who feel there should be particularly restrictive laws on unions are the only ones who might raise a question about it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Has the Senator from New York given any consideration to what the situation would be when the economic strikers had been away from their work, let us say, for a year and had been replaced by new workers? How could the question ever be resolved with regard to who should be the bargaining agent for the workers? On the one hand we would have those who had taken the place of the economic strikers, and on the other hand we would have the economic strikers. How would the question be resolved, and how long would the economic striker be vested with the right to vote on an equal basis with the worker?

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to enlist the privilege with my colleague of separating the two questions. The first question is, shall they be permitted to vote; and, if so, how? The second question is, for how long?

With respect to the first question, the National Labor Relations Board has decided it. That was the situation under the Wagner Act. The economic strikers and the replacements both vote. The aggregate vote, depending upon the majority, will determine the representation. Both classes vote, not one to the exclusion of the other, but both vote.

The second question, as to how long this right shall persist is a difficult one. It troubles me, too. I think ultimately we may be receptive to some limitation of time, but the problem of time has not arisen practically. What has happened practically is that when an unreasonable time has elapsed, people float away, and as a practical matter, are not sufficiently interested to come forward and vote.

Quite apart from that, I agree with the Senator that there should be some consideration of the time factor. But I point out that it is not such an urgent problem that it cannot be dealt with in subsequent legislation, when we have the benefit of expert advice. In the meantime, this provision seems adequate, because it allows both the economic striker and the one who has filled his job to vote. I respectfully submit, as a matter of judgment, based upon all aspects of the question, that we can go ahead and enact such a provision now, even though we may reach the point, on the basis of technical advice, when we shall wish to establish a limit, as a protection, on the time within which an economic striker may be on strike and nevertheless vote.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am glad the Senator from New York agrees with me that the question of the length of time during which the so-called economic striker shall be entitled to vote is one which should have attention.

Mr. JAVITS. Definitely.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My own view is that the question could have been taken care of in committee if there had been a desire to do so. I take it that the failure to place a time limitation on how long the right to vote shall continue is an indication that the committee did not deal with the question adequately.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not quite agree. I think the committee was dealing with a state of facts, on the record, which indicated that the time factor was not an actual problem. But I agree that it should be taken care of in late legislation. I do not believe that the failure to do so here and now means a material imperfection in this particular provision.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The reason I asked the distinguished Senator from New York to define an economic striker was the concern I have in the very point which has been raised by the distinguished Senator from Ohio. I think we can agree—at least I agree—that if we deny the right to vote to the economic strikers, we effectually defeat the right to strike.

I believe everyone would have to admit that if one loses his right to vote by engaging in a concerted stoppage of work, the right to strike has been effectively curtailed, crippled, and defeated.

We have recognized the right to strike. The act itself provides that that right shall be preserved; and we should not permit it to be defeated.

However, I think the time within which the right to vote may be exercised is a substantive matter. I wish the committee had dealt with it. I think the least that should be done is to prescribe powers for the National Labor Relations Board to fix a time. Otherwise chaos and confusion would result, and there might be a lopsided situation in which people who had left the job many months previously might outnumber those who were carrying on.

I do not want them to forfeit the right to vote too soon; but, I think there should be a time limit, and in the absence of any specific provision in the act it should be clear that the National Labor Relations Board itself should have the right, by regulation, to prescribe the time within which the voting right may be exercised.

Mr. JAVITS. It is not an actual problem, but I agree that in view of the possibilities, it is a question with which it is desirable to deal. The fact that it is not dealt with in the bill does not constitute such an imperfection in this particular provision as to warrant discarding it, because the provision could be amended on the floor of the Senate, if we felt strongly enough about it, not as a reason for striking down the whole of title VI. That is the point I am making.

We have covered "the no man's land" provision, the building and construction industry, and voting by economic strikers. There are three other matters. There is the question of supervisors, which is practically unaffected, except for a group of people in the telephone business who were unfairly placed in the supervisors category, directly responsible to management. The bill started by transferring a considerable number of superivsors from the management category into the labor category, but that provision was abandoned in committee, which I think is a change very much for the better.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I had some difficulty in reconciling my thinking to the proposal of picking out one special class of employees and specifically declaring that they shall not be considered as supervisors. I suggest that we are entering into a dangerous field when, by category and classification, we begin exempting classes, instead of dealing with the subject on the basis of a general definition or general principle. I should like to hear the Senator's comment on that subject.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe that when we have a specific situation it is susceptible to this kind of treatment. Congress has the right to establish a special category. We are doing it with respect to building construction workers.

I believe the theory behind the provision with respect to these particular supervisors is that it is generally accepted that an exception should be made, and that it was pretty well agreed that it should be made, based upon the facts.

I do not believe that we must necessarily have generic legislation. Often we must legislate rather specifically, when the facts require it. I believe that the whole justification for the particular approach in this provision is the factual justification. The committee, by a very large majority, considering that subject in and of itself, was satisfied that an exception should be made in this instance.

To summarize, I do not quarrel with the Senator. I believe that, generally speaking, legislation should be generic; but I point out that in the interest of trying to retain the Taft-Hartley amendments only where it was generally agreed that the shoe was pinching, this one was included, based upon facts, and not upon argument or principle.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My own view is that we are definitely entering into the field of trying to legislate by class. We say that this particular type of employee connected with the telephone industry shall not be considered a supervisory employee. It is my understanding that the bill has no definition of the type of work this particular group is doing.

Let me repeat, that class legislation is not sound. When we enact class legislation for this group of 20,000, later other classes will come forward and ask that they be covered specifically rather than by general law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes more to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Again I point out that I am only arguing for the proposition that we do not need to topple the entire structure of title VI in order to work our will on some individual imperfections which may exist. Fundamentally, it is desirable to include the provision because it covers some things which very urgently need to be covered.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me 2 additional minutes? Of course, I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ERVIN. Does the Senator believe that if we wish to bring in service assistants in the communications industry, we ought not to exclude persons doing exactly the same work in other industries, and therefore that we should have a general definition to include everyone, instead of covering persons on the basis of the title given them by their employers?

Mr. JAVITS. I cannot agree with that argument, because I think the entire justification is necessarily a factual one. The end sought by this particular provision in title VI is only to cover that for which we have a factual basis. We do not have a factual basis for making the provision generic, so we confine it to this particular place, where, as I stated a moment ago, the shoe is pinching.

Mr. ERVIN. If the Senator will yield further, I should like to ask him what would happen to these laws if the communications industry changed the title of the position.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not believe it is a matter purely of title. I believe there is a basis for a particular kind of activity. If the activity should be eliminated, the law would be obsolescent. I might say that the statute books are full of laws which are obsolescent. Such laws go back to the first laws which were enacted in 1789. Most laws on the statute books are no longer applicable. Some of them are laws dealing with runaway horses. They are no longer in use. I do not believe the point the Senator makes in that regard proves anything.

Mr. ERVIN. I will yield 1 more minute to the Senator from New York to permit him to answer this further question. Would not the enactment of the provision to which we are referring put the communications industry in the position of amending an act of Congress?

Mr. JAVITS. No, I do not believe so; any more than acts of Congress were especially amended when horsecars were eliminated from the streets of our cities. They were eliminated from the street on which I was born in New York City. The horsecar companies were probably regulated by some very complicated charter regulations in the city of New York and in the State of New York.

The fifth point contained in title VI has to do with prehearing elections. It deals with cutting down the workload of the National Labor Relations Board. The so-called McKinsey committee efficiency experts, reported that the NLRB workload might be cut down by as much as one-half by the adoption of the suggested procedure.

The last provision would provide for a temporary General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board. I do not believe there is any dispute about that.

To sum up the argument for title VI, it seems to me that the whole objection to the enactment of title VI is based on the belief that labor may like it. Is that an argument for voting against it? Are we going to vote against a proposal because it may be favored by some persons? If we are to do that, we will be following a standard which could easily destroy us. Some day we may be passing legislation which labor does not like, but which management likes. Shall we vote against a provision merely because labor may like it, particularly when every Senator is given an opportunity to offer any amendment he wishes to offer? I do not intend to vote on any such basis.

Mr. President, the bill does something more than legislate in the fields covered by title VI. It establishes as law the principle of democracy in unions. It adapts to their internal administration the standards of honesty and fair play which are basic to our society. It provides for conditions which would make for integrity in the relations between unions and representatives of management. This, coupled with such Taft-Hartley law amendments which at least would be a partial answer to some problems, gives us a bill worth enacting into law.

The difficulty of adopting any amendments to the Taft-Hartley law for more than a decade—only one amendment to it has been adopted in that time—should certainly convince us that to seek a set of full and finished amendments in this one bill is to seek the impossible, or, what is more likely, to attain nothing because either side seeks everything.

The subject of organizational picketing, which some persons like to call blackmail picketing—I do not know why they call it that, except to tag it with a name, because certainly it does not get down to the substance of the subject—involves questions which are fundamental to the operation of unions.

Mr. President, there is a great newspaper in my home town, the New York Times, which has objectively analyzed the pending bill. It comes to this conclusion:

> But the public interest, and labor's too, clearly calls for the passage of S. 1555. Its defeat would set labor reform back on its heels in the present session of Congress. It would be a calamity for the Senate to turn it down merely because it doesn't go far enough.

After pointing out title VI of the bill as highly controversial, it adds:

> Even at that, the opposition has been focused here, too, not so much on what is in the bill as what has been left out.

I come back to the point that the opposition, when it is boiled down, is primarily based on the contention that labor may like the bill. What is wrong with that? Labor has been living for 12 years with the Taft-Hartley Act, which it does not like. Suppose Congress could do something that it did like. Would that be wrong or bad or any reason for defeating the proposed legislation? I do not believe so. Therefore, I hope that the Ervin amendment will be rejected. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I ask the Presiding Officer how much time remains in favor of the amendment and how much in opposition to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight minutes remain in opposition.

Mr. KENNEDY. How much time remains for the proponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight minutes remain for the proponents.

Mr. KENNEDY. I wish to congratulate the Senator from New York for his very effective presentation in delineating the real issues involved in the Senate's consideration of title VI of the bill.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I will vote against the amendment of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], which would strike from the bill title VI, dealing with the Taft-Hartley Act in several particulars. As a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I wish to explain my reasons. First, I take this position because the amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act contained in title VI, concerning "no-man's land," the building construction industry, prehearing elections, and economic strikers, were very thoroughly considered by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The committee held extensive hearings on these subjects in 1958, and again this year. Last year all the amendments were approved by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in substantially the same form and were a part of title VI of the Kennedy-Ives bill, S. 3974, which, after debate, was passed by the Senate by a vote of 88 to 1.

Furthermore, the Senate should keep in mind that the President of the United States and the Secretary of Labor have recommended that action be taken in these very fields; title V of the administration, bill S. 748, which, I understand, will be offered, contains amendments dealing with every one of these subjects, although the approach is different in certain respects.

Actually, the proposal of the administration bill which would give economic strikers the right to vote is in the exact language contained in title VI of the bill before us.

What I have said about the thorough consideration by the committee of title VI and its support in principle by the administration does not mean that when specific amendments are offered to the various sections of title VI that Members of the Senate are bound by the committee's view. For myself I wish to say that when we come to the section dealing with no man's land I shall vote to amend that section, and, if necessary, I will offer an amendment to it. If the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina fails, as I believe it should, we shall have the chance to consider each section of title VI separately on its merits and, in my opinion, that is the proper way—the only way—we can proceed in this highly technical field. Every one of the amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, with the exception of section 606, which the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has mentioned, and which was unanimously adopted by the members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, has been thoroughly considered and debated by the committee and on the Senate floor last year.

There is no reason for postponing votes on the sections which are included in title VI of the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

As amendments arise, there will be an opportunity to express my views on specific amendments. But at this time I wish to make a general comment on the bill itself. At the outset of this debate, it is being said that unless title VI of the bill is further amended, particularly as regards picketing and secondary boycotts, we will be passing an ineffective bill that is a hoax and against the public interest. It is said on the floor of the Senate, and I am deluged with telegrams from employers and others making the same statements.

I appreciate and want the views of everyone, but I disagree categorically with their view that the bill is without value. I will not discuss the different titles in detail. They have been analyzed by the chief sponsor of the bill, and they will be discussed further during the debate. Briefly, title I deals with the reporting and disclosure of the financial transactions of unions, and prescribes severe penalties against union officials for wrongdoing against their members.

Title II limits the assumption of trusteeship and the control by national or international organizations over a local or a subordinate union, and prescribes means by which a local union can assert its freedom.

Title III insures larger democratic procedures in the internal affairs of a union. These ends have been demanded by the public for years, and surely their accomplishment by the Congress, will not render them "valueless," "ineffective," and a "hoax" as is now claimed. If no additions are made to this bill, and if it be passed, it will mark substantial progress in insuring democratic procedures in unions, and against wrongdoing by corrupt union officials.

Many of the present Members of the Senate were in Congress at the time the Taft-Hartley Act was passed. I was in the Congress and voted for the bill. Those who remember the debate and all of us who have served on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare know the fixed positions that labor and management take on amendments relating to the Taft-Hartley Act, and, in truth, on nearly every phase of labor-management relations. Yet as Members of the Senate we are not bound by those fixed positions: We are here to exercise our judgment—taking into consideration the public interest, as well as their claims.

There are great interests involved in the bill. The bill affects the delicate economic relationship between labor and management. It is human in its implications because it deals with the welfare of millions of union members. It deals also with the public interest.

In addition to the holding of hearings, the committee spent 3 weeks in executive discussion of the bill, section by section. The bill was improved. I pay tribute to my colleagues in the minority, for we strengthened and improved many sections and I congratulate the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], for his objectivity and his fairness in the consideration of the bill, and his leadership in its development.

As the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has said, the bill is now being judged by some, not upon what is in it, but upon the provisions not included in the bill. We will debate them as they arise. But the fact that they are not in now, or may not be included later, does not mean the bill is ineffective. Let us remember that 88 Members of the Senate voted for it last year.

So far as I am concerned, after weeks of discussion of the bill in committee, I reject, categorically, the statement that the bill does not mark any progress in the important field with which it deals.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, last year, when the Kennedy-Ives bill was before the Senate, I joined in sponsoring an amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] which providing for the striking of title VI from the bill. That was the final title. I did so because I believed, first, that the last title of the bill would impair the possibility of the passage of the bill. Second, I did so because I thought that the items contained in title VI were controversial. Third, I cosponsored the amendment because I felt that if title VI were to be included in the Taft-Hartley Act, the Senate should have given consideration to the proposal banning blackmail picketing and secondary boycotts.

It is said by the opponents of the Ervin amendment that all the items in title VI are noncontroversial. Therefore, I put this proposition: Under title VI the building crafts unions will practically be exempted from the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. An employer or a contractor will be permitted to enter into a bargaining contract with a union even though no one is working for that contractor. In other words, the contractor and the union agent will be able to make a collective bargaining agreement without the consent of any future or existing workers. I submit that that is the antithesis of liberty and freedom in this country.

If I am a carpenter or a plumber or a tinner or a plasterer, shall I not have the right to speak up concerning who is to represent me in the bargaining process? It cannot be controverted that under this provision the contractor and the union agent can make an agreement without any consent from the workers.

To point out the evil of the provision, I call attention to the provisions contained in the original bill of the administration. Secretary of Labor Mitchell sent a letter to the committee holding hearings on the bill. He recommended this prehire provision, but the Secretary of Labor had a love for liberty which was deep enough to enable him to say:

> No certification would be made under this amendment if there was no history of collective bargaining relationship between the union and the employer prior to the current agreement or if there was an allegation and the Board found that a substantial number of employees in the unit in question asserted that the union was not designated or selected as bargaining agent by a majority of such employees.

The language recommended by the Secretary of Labor was intended to protect the liberty of the worker. But that recommendation was audaciously and bluntly rejected.

I think that in the final analysis, the welfare of the American laboring man depends upon the preservation for him of his liberties. When we pretend that we are giving him something by taking away from someone else the liberty which belongs to him, I submit we are giving him a toxin rather than a tonic.

Liberties have not been taken away at one fell swoop; they have been whittled away under the pretense that good was being done while liberty was denied.

I should like to say one further word on the subject of class legislation. I am a lawyer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The time yielded to the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield an additional 5 minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I once served on the bench. As a judge, I had situations of this type come before me; and other judges have been confronted with similar situations. When a judge examines a law, and finds that it was written for a special, small class, the first thing he asks is, "How is it possible? How can the legislative branch write special legislation for a special class, when many other classes which fall into the same general category have not been dealt with?"

I submit that there is grave question about the constitutionality of this proposal, when the Congress of the Nation attempts to write a law which, in effect, will provide for the exemption of one small class of 24,000 workers among 60 million workers. Such action simply is not logical and is not compatible with the sound drafting of laws.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the Ervin amendment because in my opinion the view that the provisions of title VI are not controversial amounts to wishful thinking, not judgment based on sound reasoning. Some have wished to take the view that such provisions are noncontroversial; and thus there are some who favor the inclusion of those provisions in the bill.

Mr. President, if we are to deal with the Taft-Hartley Act, let us deal with it fully. If we are not going to deal with it fully, then let us deal only with matters which relate to the internal management of the unions.

Those are my views; and I am glad to say to the Senator from North Carolina that I am happy to support his amendment.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the able and distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The Senator from Florida is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, in the last Congress it was my conviction that a great step forward was taken by the Senate when it acted to curb irregular practices and to eliminate the racketeering element in unions, in order to protect the rank-and-file union members. That proposed legislation dealt solely with the field of the internal affairs of unions. Unfortunately, that measure was not passed by the House of Representatives.

This year, Mr. President, a labor-reform bill is again before us. The first five titles of the bill deal with relationships between unions and union officers, on the one hand, and the rank-and-file union members, on the other. These five titles deal solely with labor reform in the field of the internal affairs of unions.

On the other hand, title VI of the bill consists of proposed amendments of the Taft-Hartley Act—a field separate and distinct from the area with which the first five titles of the bill are concerned.

Title VI relates to the external affairs of unions, and extends the jurisdiction of unions into areas in which they have never had jurisdiction before. In my opinion, these matters are not adequately dealt with by the present provisions of the bill.

As the bill now stands, it includes only provisions which are favorable and acceptable to the unions. The bill as it now stands does not constitute a forthright approach to the many problems which affect not only labor and management, but also the public interest.

Congress must, therefore, of necessity deal with the many problems in the field of unions and their relationship to the general public, and certainly must deal with them adequately at a future time.

Because of the inadequate treatment of the many problems in the field of labor-management relations and the relationship of the unions to the public, it seems to me that title VI should be deleted from the pending bill, and the bill confined chiefly to dealing with the internal affairs of unions, their officers, and the responsibility of both to the rank-and-file union members. This is an essential first step which must be taken if progress to eliminate union abuses is to be made. I share the opinion that it would be a mistake for the Congress to attempt to deal with both of these fields in this one piece of proposed legislation.

As we observe from reading page 5 of the committee's report, the committee itself has recognized the necessity of giving consideration to the enactment of separate legislation in regard to the labor-management field, and has appointed a panel of experts to advise it on appropriate modifications of existing law. There is an indication that the committee will move as soon as practicable into this area of legislative revision.

If the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare itself has recognized that the bill as it now stands attempts to deal with two different fields, and that it attempts to deal with only one of them—namely, labor-union reforms—with apparent adequacy, why, then, should amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act be proposed separately and distinctly from the provisions which deal with labor-union reform? I think that appears to be like offering a piece of candy to a sick child, in order to get him to take the necessary medicine which is vital to his own health.

Mr. President, I will support the Ervin amendment to delete title VI from the pending bill, for the reason that I believe the bill should be confined to what must necessarily come first—namely, labor-union reform legislation, to eliminate graft, corruption, abuse, and other irregularities of unions and union officers, and to afford substantial protection to the rank-and-file union members. I believe that is the proper approach to the problem which is facing us.

Mr. President, if the Ervin amendment to delete title VI of the bill is not adopted, then I propose to support amendments, which I understand will be offered by the able Senator from Arkansas, and possibly by other Senators, which go further into the entire labor-management field, and particularly have reference to ways and means of tightening up the provisions with respect to secondary boycotts, organizational picketing, and proposed legislation designed to eliminate the so-called "hot cargo" practices which now are being indulged in.

I think the general public expects us to divide this problem into those two parts, as originally intended, and first to clean up the unions and eliminate corruption from them—although, of course, such conditions exist only in some unions, and are not found in all unions. I believe the Kennedy-Ervin bill does a good job in that field.

But when the pending bill reaches into the area of the union's relationship with the general public, and only halfheartedly deals with that subject, and does not face up to the pressing problems which have been so vividly demonstrated in the course of the hearings held by the McClellan committee, there is a failure to do the necessary job; and I think if we favor such an approach, we fail to do our duty.

Therefore, Mr. President, if the Ervin amendment to delete title 6 of this measure is not adopted, I will support amendments which will be offered in order to give meaningful effect to the handling of problems in the labor-management field.

There is just one other point I would like to bring out if we are to legislate here on the floor of the Congress Taft-Hartley amendments.

Under the act as I have always understood it, certain exemptions are permitted seasonable industries, and those in existence which have little or no effect on interstate commerce. I refer to the seafood industry, itinerant agricultural workers and the hotel industry in my own State. There are efforts to exert National Labor Relations Board jurisdiction over these industries. It is clear that their primary activities are intrastate and most certainly these exemptions should be continued. I intend to support amendments to achieve this objective also.

Matters dealing with amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act relate not only to unions, but management, and in particular the public interest. Consideration of the amendments should not deal only with labor or management. They should take into consideration the primary objective of adequately protecting the public interest. This is a field which should be considered separately from the pending bill.

It is my firm conviction that if anything is to be achieved at all in labor union reform, we must confine ourselves to the first five titles of the pending bill.

I sincerely trust that the Senate will adopt his course of action.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The time yielded to the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for an additional minute.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator from Florida elaborate on what he had in mind when he said the proposed solution appears to him to be similar to offering a piece of candy in order to obtain acceptance of what is good, whereas without the offering of the candy, what is good will not be taken?

Mr. SMATHERS. In reply, let me say to the Senator from Ohio that the general appearance of the bill in its present form is that in order to get the unions—that is to say, the union heads, possibly not the union members—to go along with this bill, which is necessary medicine which most of them agree they need to take, we have to give them a "piece of candy." Apparently that is the view of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Certainly that is what title VI of the pending bill—just a piece of candy which actually we should not have to give them, because I think the McClellan committee hearings have amply demonstrated that graft and corruption do exist in some unions and should be eliminated from them. So certainly it should not be necessary to give candy to any union, in order to get them to agree they will stop cheating their own members.

Furthermore, Mr. President, let me say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time yielded to the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield an additional minute to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I was about to say that I do not believe we should have to offer people an inducement, to get them to agree to stop taking money which does not belong to them or to agree that they will bring into the unions the democracy and the democratic practices which they should have had right along, or to get them to agree to stop indulging in gangster practices in dealing with their own members. In short, I do not believe we should have to give people candy in order to get them to agree to do what is right. They should be willing to say that they want to bring honesty and cleanliness into their own unions; and I am sure that there are many of them who do.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, with the understanding that the time will not be taken from either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATION OF CHRISTIAN A. HERTER TO BE SECRETARY OF STATE

As in executive session,

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate is operating, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nomination of the distinguished Christian A. Herter to be Secretary of State, and that it be in order to consider this nomination, notwithstanding the fact that the nomination has not appeared on the calendar and the calendar has not been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the nomination.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Christian A. Herter, of Massachusetts, to be Secretary of State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall be very brief, because we expect to vote shortly on the pending amendment, but I should like to have the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations make a statement to the Senate preceding action on the nomination of Mr. Herter to be Secretary of State.

The President of the United States has named Christian A. Herter to be Secretary of State. Most of the Members of the Congress know Mr. Herter well. Most Senators knew Mr. Herter as a Member of the House of Representatives, as Governor of Massachusetts, and as Under Secretary of State. The fact is, Mr. President, that Mr. Herter shortly will be the Secretary of State, and we want the entire Nation to know that we are united behind him. I think the quicker the Senate acts on this nomination the better.

I am informed that the Committee on Foreign Relations, which is presided over by the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], very carefully considered the nomination, and recommended that the Senate confirm it. I should like to have the Senator from Arkansas make a brief statement before action is taken by the entire body.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am very happy that the majority leader has called up the nomination. The Committee on Foreign Relations heard Mr. Herter this morning, and after the public meeting, in an executive session the committee voted unanimously to suspend its own 6-day rule, which normally requires that a nomination lie over 6 days. The committee then unanimously ordered the nomination to be favorably reported to the Senate.

I shall be very brief in discussing the nominee himself. I have known Mr. Herter quite well for a number of years. We both became Members of the House of Representatives in 1943, but Mr. Herter's public career goes back much further than that. He really became a member of the Department of State in the capacity of an attaché of our Embassy in Berlin in 1919, I believe it was, shortly after World War I. He is in the real sense of the word a career member of the Department of State. He has been in and out of the Department in various capacities.

Mr. Herter served 10 years as a Member of the House of Representatives, and he also served as Governor of the State of Massachusetts.

He lived for several years in his youth in France, where he, of course, learned to speak French. He also speaks German.

I would say that this man is qualified to be the leader of the Department of State in nearly every respect I can think of.

Furthermore, we have observed Mr. Herter as the Under Secretary of State. He is a man of unquestioned integrity, of ability, and, I am sure, of good judgment. I believe we were quite fortunate in having someone thoroughly familiar with the business of the Department of State in all of its aspects ready, willing, and able to take over the arduous duties which illness has forced Secretary Dulles to relinquish. We are very fortunate indeed, and I hope the Senate will proceed to confirm the nomination.

Mr SALTONSTALL and Mr. MANSFIELD addressed the Chair.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

I simply wish to substantiate what I have heard the Senator from Arkansas say. I have worked with Mr. Herter in the State government of Massachusetts and in the Federal Government when he was an official of it, and I was an official of the State government, and vice versa. I have been a friend of his since college days. I know him to be a man of integrity, of character, of imagination, and of independent judgment. I am confident that he will make a good Secretary of State and will be a real Secretary of State in his own name, promoting the ideas he thinks will be for the best interests of our country.

I thank the Senator from Arkansas for yielding to me to make this statement.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to join the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the distinguished majority leader, the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts, the distinguished minority leader, and other Senators who may speak on the nomination, recently unanimously approved by the Committee on Foreign Relations, of Mr. Christian A. Herter to be Secretary of State.

I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if it is usual to waive the 6-day rule.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is not usual. I think it is most unusual, and it is done only in cases when we feel not only that the nominee has unquestioned capacity and qualifications, but also that very unusual circumstances demand prompt action. I have seen it done very seldom, indeed, and I do not think it ought to be done very often. In this case, the committee felt the circumstances I have mentioned were sufficiently important to warrant the action.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I agree with the Senator, and I reiterate that the approval of the Foreign Relations Committee on this nomination was unanimous. We would like to see the nomination confirmed by the Senate this afternoon, so that Mr. Herter will have all the assurance and confidence that we, his former colleagues in both Houses of Congress, can give him in this time of great need.

I am happy this nomination has been brought to the attention of the Senate this afternoon by the distinguished majority leader, and we are indebted to him for the remarks he has made as to the unity of the legislative branch of the Government in this particular instance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I quite agree with what the distinguished majority whip has said. I want not only Mr. Herter to know, but I want the world to know, that this Nation is united behind the Secretary of State whose nomination is about to be confirmed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, yesterday I made a bit of a statement on the Senate floor in behalf of the new Secretary of State, Christian A. Herter. I think perhaps that statement deserves a little amplification.

Very often we deal with personalities in Government concerning whom we have a rather general and somewhat amorphous idea as to who they are and what they have done. So I think always a little factual recital can be helpful.

I served with Christian Herter for four terms in the House of Representatives, and I came to know him quite well. I took the trouble to look up his background a little, so that I would be adequately fortified with information.

Mr. Herter is 64 years old, if anyone is interested in his age. He is a man of family, with four children.

I doubt whether one could point a finger at any other individual in the United States today who has had such a rounded background in the whole field of foreign affairs and in so many facets of that field.

Christian Herter was born in Paris. His father and mother, interestingly enough, were artists. He came back to the United States and graduated from Harvard cum laude, having in mind that he was going to become an architect. He quickly abandoned that ambition in 1916, and took an assignment in the foreign field, at Berlin. From then on he has been more or less identified, one way and another, with the whole field of international relations.

There have come to him, of course, certain respites, such as when he was a member of the Massachusetts Legislature. He was speaker for 4 years, as I recall. He served four terms in the Congress. He served two terms as Governor of Massachusetts. Then he came to Washington as Under Secretary of State.

Administratively, legislatively, and in other fields, including publishing as an editor, and as a lecturer on international relations at Harvard, he has had a rounded experience indeed.

Mr. President, I deplore, a little, some of the speculation I have seen editorially about some delay, and whether it impaired the prestige of Mr. Herter. I do not believe it did. I do not see how it could possibly impair his prestige. I am sensible of the fact that time is of the essence, for as Mr. Herter goes abroad we want to be sure he carries the full prestige of the office to which he has been nominated by the President of the United States.

I express my personal gratitude to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was generous indeed to waive the customary time limit which generally affects nominations, so that this nomination could be confirmed by the Senate without delay.

I also express to the majority leader our gratitude for interposing this matter in the middle of consideration of the bill which is presently before the Senate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Illinois for his remarks. Inasmuch as he has undertaken to relate the facts, let me say that we developed the facts a short time ago in the committee. I believe that, in addition to his 4 children, Mr. Herter has some 10 grandchildren.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Twelve.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. And I believe he served five terms in the House instead of four. He served for 10 years, did he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thought it was 8.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I merely wished to keep the record straight.

What the Senator has said emphasizes the fact that we have before us the nomination of a man with a very distinguished public record, which has been before us all. One of the reasons why we could proceed so quickly to dispose of the nomination was that his record was so well known.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, whether the Secretary served four or five terms in the House is not important. What is important is that every man who served with him has the highest respect for him. We all know him as a good man, a kindly man, an able man, who puts the interests of his country first in every instance.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I never like to be shortchanged in connection with my term of service. When I am introduced and the introducer says that I served six terms in the House when I served eight, I feel like making a correction.

The esteemed Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] advises me that Mr. Herter served five terms in the House. I am delighted to make the correction.

In further amplification, I was abroad at the time Christian Herter was there with a subcommittee of the House gathering facts and data to implement what became known as the Marshall plan. I was the chairman of a committee of 10 members of the House Appropriations Committee and 10 members of the Armed Services Committee. I saw his work in Europe. I can testify to his resourcefulness, his skill, his thoroughness, and the scholarly way in which he approached that effort.

That rounds out the background for his present responsibility.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, it was my privilege to serve in the House of Representatives with Christian Herter, and also to serve under his chairmanship as head of the Select Committee on Foreign Aid, which went to Europe in the fall of 1947. That is the committee to which the distinguished minority leader has just alluded. It became known, not as the Select Committee on Foreign Aid, but as the Herter committee, because of the impress of his personality, his true qualities of leadership, and his ability at organization. Those of us who were privileged to serve on the Select Committee on Foreign Aid, known as the Herter committee, soon were disabused of the idea that that was an ordinary committee going to Europe on a junket, or anything of that kind. It was my privilege to be designated by Chairman Herter as the chairman of the Subcommittee for Germany and Austria.

I was given a number of books and pamphlets which I was expected to study during the time we were crossing the ocean. The first day after we got our sealegs we found that the committee was expected to meet every morning for 2 hours to consider the presentation of material with respect to the particular countries to which we were assigned.

Not only on our trip going over were we so briefed, so to speak, but on the return trip we were expected to assemble each day, and each subcommittee made a report upon the particular country which he visited.

The Herter committee spent some 6 weeks on that trip. For 5 weeks I was in Germany and Austria. Mr. Herter, as chairman of the full committee, not merely started with us on our study in Germany, but he visited us when we went to Prague. He was at all times the real chairman of the committee.

I wish to put this word into the RECORD because I can speak from experience on the particular assignment in connection with which Mr. Herter won his spurs, so to speak, in the field of international recognition.

I have always counted it a privilege to have served on that committee under his leadership, because it retained the respect and recognition of the people of Europe, as well as the people at home. It laid the foundation for the consideration of the so-called Marshall plan.

The late Dr. Eaton was for many years the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives. We were given to understand that the select committee was to be a working committee. Chris Herter made it a working committee, a productive committee, and he attained recognition in the field of European affairs which stands him in good stead at this time.

Personally, I feel that the work of the committee was not merely a reflection of his ability, but that it provided him also with a background of the problems of Central Europe, which qualifies him for this important position of responsibilty at this time.

I commend the leadership and the Committee on Foreign Relations for bringing the nomination to the floor of the Senate for prompt action.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I wish to join in expressing appreciation of the fact that the committee has reported the nomination in such short order, and that the 6-day rule is to be waived.

I also had the privilege of serving with Mr. Herter in the House of Representatives. I am sure that every man who served with him and who knew of his work in the House of Representatives respects him for his ability, his courage, and his intelligence. I believe that Mr. Herter will enter upon the duties of this office with the confidence and support not only of Members of the Senate who served with him in the House, but of all Members of Congress.

To my mind, Mr. Herter has handled himself with dignity, honor, and intelligence during the time he has been Under Secretary of State. I believe he has the capacity and the ability properly and effectively to represent our Government at this very important and delicate time.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, having served with Chris Herter in the House of Representatives, and having had a close working arrangement with him in connection with a number of matters during his tenure as Under Secretary, I have no doubt that he will be an outstanding Secretary of State. His broad experience in foreign affairs, his harmonious working relationships with Members of both Houses of Congress, and the universal respect which we and the country hold for him assure his success. I am confident that he will carry forward with vigor and intelligence the foreign policy of firmness and strength which has characterized the tenure of his predecessor, and which is so necessary to preserve the peace of the world.

I commend the majority leader and the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations for the expedition with which they have brought this nomination before us.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, like many of my colleagues in this body I, too, have had the honor of serving in the House of Representatives with the distinguished Secretary of State.

Mr. Herter is a man with long experience in the field of foreign relations, dating back to World War I. He played a very important role in the crucial postwar period.

During my service with him in the House of Representatives I had the privilege of serving on some of the committees on which he was active.

Mr. Herter is a man of good judgment and keen intellect. I think he is indeed possessed of the qualities which will make him a great Secretary of State.

I believe that he enters upon this office with the strong bipartisan support of Members of both the House and Senate. This is particularly true of those of us who have had an opportunity to know him and his family over the years, and to appreciate his outstanding qualities. I wish him well. I know that the other Members of the Senate will give him the kind of support he needs in this great hour of trial for our country.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, first I wish to commend the majority leader and the minority leader and the Senate itself for granting unanimous consent for immediate action on the confirmation of the nomination of Christian Herter to be Secretary of State.

I also wish to commend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], who this morning was very helpful in securing the waiver, at least for the present, of the 6-day rule of the committee, which would have held up the nomination for 6 days.

Our action should demonstrate to our Nation and to the world that Congress can act with haste if it must and when it is in the interest of our national welfare. I believe that the action which is being taken by the Senate today will mean much by way of strengthening our position among the other nations of the earth. It will be most helpful to the new Secretary of State in carrying out the policies of the administration.

It was my privilege to serve, along with many other Members of the Senate, with Christian Herter when he was a Member of the House of Representatives. I know him personally. His many years of service in dealing with international affairs give him every qualication for this important place. He will deal with firmness but at the same time not be so inflexible as not to see the others' problems.

It is a pleasure to urge the Senate to approve this nomination by a unanimous vote.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, in the action which the Senate is about to take and in the deliberate and efficient speed by which it undertakes now to discharge its constitutional responsibility by approving Christian Herter as American Secretary of State, there is, I believe, a good augury for America and, beyond that, for the cause of freedom in the world.

The President of the United States has nominated Christian Herter to be Secretary of State. A good many Members of the Congress have served with him in public capacities during the past many years. To find now, in a Senate in which the majority of the Members have a different partisan faith from that of the administration, a very great, indeed, I believe, unanimous approval, which is about to be given to this nomination of the President, must spotlight the fact that here is an able American patriot whose voice in questions of foreign policy will be the unequivocating voice of the people and the Government of the United States. That will be a comfort to our free friends wherever they may be. It will also make unmistakably clear to the nations on the other side of the Iron Curtain that America is united in its peoples and its labors, as the President has so often said, for peace with justice in this melancholy and war-weary world. We, all of us, wish for Mr. Herter every success, and we offer him all cooperation.

I am glad to join my able colleague, the minority leader, in congratulating the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], for the speed and the efficiency by which they have now presented to the Senate the question of the constitutional approval of America's foreign policy spokesman. This is a good moment in the Senate. Here is a united labor for America, free from partisan concern.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the time is critical. The meeting of the foreign ministers will begin within a few days. The Summit meeting, which may follow, would come shortly thereafter.

The problems in the field of international relations are grave. I believe that the Senate very properly is yielding to the unanimous request of the Committee on Foreign Relations and its Chairman that the nomination be taken up without delay and that its confirmation should follow in the shortest period of time possible.

I am certainly one of those who is fond of Mr. Herter, and I wish for him the very best of success as he approaches the terrific responsibilities which confront him. I believe that the action being taken today should show beyond any cavil that he has the backing and good wishes and confidence of the people of the United States. Certainly he has my confidence and will have strong and sympathetic support.

However, Mr. President, we would be unrealistic if we did not give attention to the note which I am about to voice. There are a large number of people in my State—and they are very fine people who have nothing at all against Mr. Herter personally, and have so expressed themselves by their letters and telegrams to me—who are fearful as to whether he has the resolution, the firmness, and the completely unyielding quality on matters of high principle affecting our Nation and the other freedom-loving nations of the earth, which he must possess and which he must show by his actions if he is to fully meet the very grave responsibility now about to be entrusted to him.

The RECORD ought to show that there is this large group of good people in our Nation who will undoubtedly wish him well and who undoubtedly like him personally, but who still have reservations as to his resolution and his fortitude—as to his sturdiness and his willingness to stand up under fire, and as to his firmness under all kinds of wearing conditions which he will face in the difficult negotiations he is about to undertake.

Mr. President, I am sure I voice the hopes and prayers of the people I have mentioned that he will live up splendidly to the very great test which he faces. I certainly hope so, Mr. President. However, I believe that we would be derelict in our duty if we did not show in these proceedings, in this debate, that there is this one lingering feeling, which it is hoped Mr. Herter will accept as a challenge—and I believe he will do just that—to show the utmost resolution and the utmost firmness and the utmost unwillingness to yield on matters of high principle as he undertakes the tremendous task which now confronts him.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I wish to add a word in support of the confirmation of the nomination of the distinguished former Governor of Massachusetts to be the Secretary of State. The position of Secretary of State is probably one of the highest and most important offices not only in this country but in the whole free world. It is, therefore, necessary that we approach the filling of that office with the utmost care. I know that the President of the United States, in his concern for our country and for the free world, feels he has made an excellent choice in picking a man who is familiar with what has been going on in every corner of the earth.

Some persons have said that they do not know whether Chris Herter will be sufficiently firm. I believe that the man who was engaged in feeding hungry people in Europe after World War II, and who has served with John Foster Dulles, particularly during the past trying months, has assimilated some of the thoughts and some of the strong, positive feelings held by John Foster Dulles.

Regardless of who we are, we must say today that Mr. Dulles has been an outstanding Secretary of State. In my judgment, he will be remembered, as history is written, as one of our truly great Secretaries of State.

I believe Chris Herter will be a good successor and will maintain the firm position of Mr. Dulles. If he does not, I will be one of the first to criticize him. But I have faith that he will perform his duties well in behalf of this country and the entire free world. I am happy to support the confirmation of his nomination.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, very early in World War II at the start of 1942, President Roosevelt asked Archibald MacLeish, who was then the Librarian of Congress, to call together a group of writers to advise on governmental policies in the field of information. I served for 2 or 3 months in that agency before I entered the military service.

At that time I shared a very small cubicle or office with Christian A. Herter, who was likewise a member of that group. I know Mr. Herter personally, although I have never been associated with him in any other official capacity except that. I have a very high opinion of his qualifications—his character, intellect, integrity, and ability. I think he will need all those sterling qualities now.

I wish I knew more about diplomacy and international relations. I imagine it is very easy to be Secretary of State of the United States so long as our country is the top power or the so-called top dog in the world. But I think it must be a great deal more difficult to be the American Secretary of State when this country is no longer absolutely supreme militarily in the world.

At the recent Gridiron Club dinner, a number of songs were sung by the correspondents who took part in the skits on that occasion. I do not remember precisely the words of one of the songs, but the gist of it was that the United States no longer is the supreme power or top dog on our planet.

If the theme of that song be true—and perhaps it may be—I think we are imposing on Mr. Herter a more difficult task as Secretary of State than many of his many predecessors have faced. When the United States no longer has as its own the ultimate weapon, our Secretary of State is called upon to be far more adroit, far more informed, and far more patient, and perhaps even to submit to more intense political criticism at home.

I simply say that Mr. Herter deserves all our cooperation, all our backing, all our support, and all our understanding, so that we will not be tempted to engage in any reckless political criticisms of him when things do not seem to be going too well. I have the feeling that in the years immediately ahead, with Russia already emerging from medievalism and Red China just beginning to cast aside peasantry and to also enter the industrial age, any man who serves as our Secretary of State, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, will need all our understanding and cooperation and patience.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, it is highly gratifying to hear, from both sides of the aisle, these testimonials and tributes to a great American. Once more, I express my gratitude to the majority leader.

I respectfully suggest to him, if he does not already have it in mind, that perhaps we may have a yea-and-nay vote on the confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Herter to be Secretary of State.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to speak in my own right and in my own time on the nomination of Mr. Herter.

It was my pleasure this morning to second the motion in the Committee on Foreign Relations to recommend to the Senate the setting aside or the suspension for this occasion of the so-called 6-day rule on nominations. Although as an ordinary practice I regard the rule as sound, I think its suspension on this occasion is justifiable, and I said so this morning in committee, because I believe it would be very much misunderstood throughout the world if the nomination of the Secretary of State were not acted upon today.

In my opinion it is very important that clear notice be served to the world that we are pleased to confirm in his position a new Secretary of State, whose nomination was made necessary because of the tragic illness of Secretary John Foster Dulles. But, as I pointed out in the committee this morning in a public hearing, and made clear to my colleagues also in an executive session, I consider it to be very important that in carrying out the duty of the Senate, under the advice and consent clause of the Constitution, a record should be made with the nominee on the great, broad problems and foreign policies themselves which so vitally concern the American people, and which are so closely related to the destiny of this Republic.

SENATE MUST FULFILL ITS FOREIGN POLICY RESPONSIBILITIES

As I made clear to Secretary Herter this morning, I congratulate him on the opportunity for the performance of great public service which is now his. But Congress needs to keep in mind at all times that it, too, has very definite responsibilities in connection with the formulation of foreign policy. Also, any administration, of any party, at anytime, needs to keep that constitutional fact in mind.

Our Founding Fathers, for example, made very clear their intention to have Congress play a part in the formulation of foreign policy, when they vested in Congress the power to declare war. Of course, the events of foreign policy can present a factual situation which may necessitate a declaration of war. They are of such a nature that too frequently they can develop into an engulfment of the Nation by a failure on the part of the administration at any given time to keep the American people fully informed, at least through their elected representatives in Congress, of the facts about world affairs which are threatening the peace.

So, in my examination of Mr. Herter this morning I considered it to be my duty, under the advice and consent clause of the Constitution, to discuss with him some of the great policy questions with which I think the Nation is confronted in the field of foreign policy. I did so because in the past, in executive sessions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I was not happy with the position which Mr. Herter took concerning one of those major problems. But he satisfied me today by a forthright discussion of some facets of the problems I raised in executive session some time ago. He took a position today which I could strongly support.

GREAT ISSUES FOR THE SECRETARY

For the record, and possibly by way of notice for future reference, I wish to comment on one or two of those policies, because I think any Secretary of State, at the time of the confirmation of his nomination, is entitled to have anyone in the confirming body make his record on any reservations he may have as to the policies in the the field of foreign relations of the administration of which the nominee is a part. So I raised with the Secretary this morning, and raise with the Senate this afternoon, what I consider to be the greatest moral issue facing mankind. In my opinion, it is the greatest moral issue facing my country. After all, we have to examine our historic responsibilities as a nation toward the great problem of trying to keep the peace, or more properly, to win the peace, because the peace has yet to be won.

I have been concerned, and still am very much concerned, about the attitude of many persons in high places in our government, both in the military and in the civil administration, concerning a nuclear war. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I have been very much concerned about some of the implications from the testimony given in executive session by some military officials and by some civilians who have administrative responsiblities in the Defense Establishment. Their statements have caused me to become fearful that there are in high places in our government some who have not given sufficient thought to the disastrous effects of a preventive war, in view of the fact that a preventive war would be as devastating to mankind as an aggressive war. Therefore, I have been, and still am, greatly concerned about the policy of the government in respect to doing everything possible to reach some kind of a world understanding which will make a nuclear war impossible.

As I pointed out this morning, in my examination of Mr. Herter, once mankind became aware—many years ago, in the time of the First World War—of the devastating effects of poison gas, all the nations agreed that poison gas would not be used; and it has not been used. But the disastrous effects upon mankind of a nuclear war would be of such far greater magnitude than the effects of poison gas as almost to defy the imagination.

I believe that anything we can do to further an international agreement, understanding, or commitment that a nuclear war will not be engaged in will be the greatest service to moral values our generation can perform.

EFFECTS OF NUCLEAR WAR

As has been indicated to us, and as I repeated today in the course of the examination of Mr. Herter, a substantial body of scientific opinion holds that if Russia and the United States were to let loose on the earth all the nuclear power now in storage—and it seems to me that if a nuclear war ever started, that is exactly what we would have to expect would happen—the radiation effects would do irreparable harm and damage to all forms of life in large areas of the world—certainly to most of Russia, to all of Europe, to all of the United States, to all of Canada, to much of the northern tier of the countries of Latin America, and to the eastern tier of the countries of Asia—and the radiation would linger for as long as several thousand years. It is horrible to contemplate such a result; and, in my opinion, it raises, very directly and inescapably, a moral issue.

So, Mr. President, I do not believe that any country has the moral right to engage in a nuclear war. That is why I believe it is so important for those who are in charge of the foreign policy of our country, particularly the President and the Secretary of State, in their administrative capacities—and their obligations in the field of foreign policy are administrative—to make clear to the American people, and to the people of all the world, that we are desirous at all times of finding solutions to the issues between nations that threaten nuclear war.

Until some better vehicle or instrumentality can be devised, Mr. President, I shall continue to take the position—as I emphasized this morning in my discussion with Mr. Herter—that our country should make greater use than it has been making of the procedures of the United Nations. One of my criticisms of American foreign policy is that on too many occasions, on too many issues, the United States has been guilty of circumventing the United Nations, and time and time again has acted outside that organization, on issues which carried the potentiality of a threat to peace in the world. Without a machinery for settling disputes, nations will rely upon their own force of arms to settle them.

So this morning I expressed to the new Secretary of State my prayerful hope that under his administration there will be a greater use of the procedures of the United Nations.

Mr. President, a few weeks ago I was somewhat concerned about what Mr. Herter's position would be in case an aggressive course of action occurred in Berlin, and in case some airplanes were shot down there. In that case, would our country then proceed, on the basis of the belief that that was an act of war, as I believe it would be, to initiate a nuclear war?

I was very much concerned because some of our high military leaders left in my mind no room for doubt that such was their own position. I realize that that would be the reflex action of any of us, and especially of our military forces, for it would be only human to react in that way. But, Mr. President, because there is that great danger, I believe it most important—as I suggested today to the newly appointed Secretary of State—that we now draw the rest of the world in with us in discussion of the Berlin crisis, because that crisis is now the problem of every nation in the world. It is not only the problem of Russia, the United States, Great Britain, France, and the two Germanys. It is the problem of all the peoples of the world, including those in countries which did not enter into any agreement, as Russia, the United States, France, and Great Britain did, in respect to the occupation of Berlin.

UNITED NATIONS MUST TAKE CONTROL OF PEACE-THREATENING ISSUES

Mr. President, I believe we have reached such a time in history that when any specific issue arising between two or more nations in fact threatens the peace of the world, the party disputants cannot take the position that they, and they alone, have the sovereign right to seek to solve that problem by war, or even by negotiations between them outside the United Nations.

That is why I repeat on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, as I expressed it to the Secretary this morning, my hope that there will be some change in our policy—good precedent has been established for it, I recognize, but I think there is a need for a change of policy—so that we will urge the conduct of high level negotiations under the canopy and jurisdiction of the United Nations.

It is not a satisfactory anwser to me, I say most respectfully, for Mr. Herter to say, as he did this morning, it is his understanding that the Secretary General of the United Nations will be available, and his good offices will be available—he said he did not know whether in an official or an unofficial capacity—in connection with the negotiations which he said will take place in the near future.

Mr. President, the Secretary General of the United Nations should be an official part of those negotiations, and the negotiations should be conducted under the official sanction of the United Nations, and the procedures within the charter for such a course of action, if the nations of the world have the will to follow that procedure. Maybe they will not want to, but I surmise that if this great Republic, dedicated to peace as it is, would lead the world by a proposal to have the United Nations exercise its official auspices over those negotiations, most of the world would support the proposal.

One of the reasons why I stress that point so much, and I did it this morning, and shall do so time and time again, Mr. President, is that I am convinced it offers the best, if not the only, hope for permanent peace. One of the reasons why I continually stress the use of the peaceful procedures of the United Nations before the fact, before we are forced into making an instantaneous decision as to whether we will have to start dropping bombs, is that I think the use of those peaceful procedures will have a very salutary effect on the party disputants.

Do not forget, Mr. President, that the American leaders are human, too, and the same blood chemistry runs through the physiology of Americans as runs through the physiology of Russians, Germans, Englishmen, and Frenchmen. What we need are checks also on emotional dangers in foreign relations, and the procedures of the United Nations, I think, are very effective checks.

Therefore, I hope Mr. Herter will demonstrate flexibility and dedication to the application of the rules of reason in international negotiations, so we can constantly keep Russia on the defensive before the bar of world opinion in respect to the question to be put to the world, "Who is it that seeks the peace, and who is it that jeopardizes it?"

The sad fact is—we do not like to hear it, but it is true—that whenever information goes out to the world that there are those in officialdom in the United States who are even indicating that we might lead the world into preventive war by using nuclear bombs, then millions of people say, "Do we not have cause to fear the United States as much as Russia, because they are the two powers—Russia and the United States—that even seem to consider the possibility of settling the differences between them by the use of nuclear bombs?"

Mr. President, such a course of action would be immoral, whether it were followed by my country or Russia, or both. I was very much pleased to hear Mr. Herter restate, as we carried on a colloquy this morning in the Foreign Relations Committee, what I was satisfied was his own philosophy in regard to the desirability of trying to reach some agreement in the whole field of disarmament in respect to nuclear weapons. Of course, the discussion needs to be extended to all other weapons, too, because before it is too late, the American people ought to recognize we cannot win a nuclear war. We can only defeat Russia in one; but in defeating Russia, we would also defeat ourselves, because of the horrendous damage which would be done to us for decades and decades to come.

CONGRESS MUST BE KEPT INFORMED

There are two other points I wish to cover briefly, Mr. President, in making my record in regard to this nomination. I wish to say from the floor of the Senate this afternoon that I hope Mr. Herter will deal openly with the Congress of the United States; that Mr. Herter will recognize the desirability—yes, the right—of the Congress, the constitutionally elected representatives of the people of the Nation, to full information in regard to the development of policies which may create international crises for the United States.

I hope, Mr. President, that never again will we find ourselves in the situation in which we found ourselves at the time of the Lebanon crisis, when there was an administration conference with congressional leaders held at the White House. An oversight was committed in failing to tell the congressional leaders, at the very moment they sat in the White House, that the Marines were already on their way to Lebanon.

That occurrence came as a great shock to me, Mr. President, but the record is clear it was the fact. I brought that fact out, as the transcript of record of the Foreign Relations Committee will show.

I hope, Mr. President, never again will we in the United States be subjected to that kind of government by secrecy because the elected representatives of the American people are entitled to know, before the fact, foreign policy developments which, if they go awry, might put us in a position in the Senate of being called upon to support a resolution of a declaration of war.

It needs to be said over and over again that we do not countenance the opinion, which is all too prevalent, that because of the way wars are now waged the war clause of the Constitution of the United States has become an empty phrase, and that we can expect the Congress to find itself in a position of being asked to declare war after war exists.

I hope our Secretary of State will have a high appreciation of what I consider to be the responsibility of the Executive to keep the Congress informed before the fact.

In recent years, as I have stood at times, with a minority on the floor of the Senate on some foreign policy questions, I have been told in the cloakroom there was nothing my colleagues could do about the situation because "the fat is in the fire." The argument is made that "the fat is in the fire," and therefore we have to support the administration. I think that rests upon a great fallacy. What it rests upon is a failure of an administration to keep us advised beforehand so that our advice and consent could be given beforehand.

Let me cite, for example, Mr. President, the Formosa doctrine and the Eisenhower doctrine in the Middle East. I know that in some instances there were colleagues who disapproved of both doctrines, but who felt they should vote for them because "the fat is in the fire."

Mr. President, the "fat in the fire" argument simply is a demonstration of a fact that in the United States in recent years—and it is not limited to a Republican administration, although I think there has been a great acceleration of this policy under the present administration—both the Congress and the people have had concealed from them facts about their foreign policy which they ought to have known, so that this body could properly give its advice and consent to the Government in respect to foreign policy.

I say to Mr. Herter from this desk today that I am pleased to vote for the confirmation of his nomination, but I trust that he will develop a flexible program; that he will urge a cessation of a policy which has circumvented the United Nations time and time again; that he will recognize the responsibilities of Congress in the field of foreign policy; and that he will appreciate the fact that the war clause of the Constitution represents one of the solemn obligations of the Congress of the United States, and that to exercise our duties under it we are entitled to be informed long before a crisis reaches the point when it may become necessary to declare war.

RULE OF LAW MUST BE FURTHERED

Lastly, Mr. President, I sincerely hope the new Secretary of State will start recommending the use of the judicial processes of the United Nations Charter. I was delighted the other day to read that the Vice President of the United States has discovered that the United Nations Charter contains many provisions for the use of judicial processes. It was a pleasure to read of the speech of the Vice President in support of a greater use of what is known as the rule of law in the field of international relations. I always welcome "Johnny come latelys," if they will only come. I do not know where the Vice President has been since 1945, because since 1945 there has been a group of us in the Senate who have been urging a greater use of the rule of law by both Democratic and Republican administrations.

Mr. President, this great principle is nonpartisan if there was ever a nonpartisan principle.

I hope that Mr. Herter will give the very studious consideration of which I know him to be capable to those provisions of the United Nations Charter such as article 96, which provides for the General Assembly to call upon the World Court, for instance, for an advisory opinion. It is sad to note in the history of my country that we have yet to propose such a resolution to the General Assembly of the United Nations in connection with any one of the major issues which have threatened the peace of the world, which issues have of course involved questions of international law.

I felt that these statements should be made today, as a new Secretary of State takes office, because the course of action the United States follows in the field of foreign policy during the tenure of the new Secretary of State may well determine the difference between a nuclear war, with the resulting destruction of American and Russian civilizations, and progress toward the establishment of permanent peace on the face of the earth by a recognition, that rules of reason and not threats of force ought to be the controlling feature of America's foreign policy.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I wanted the privilege of saying a word in connection with the confirmation of the nomination of Christian Herter to be Secretary of State.

I had the honor of sitting next to Mr. Herter for 6 years, and I mean exactly next to him, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the other body. It is rare that one can speak of a public official in such a high office in such personal terms.

Mr. President, I believe the President of the United States, in terms of fitness by training, by temperament, and by ideology has made an unparalleled choice, of a man to undertake the particular task which will challenge Mr. Herter.

As my distinguished colleague from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has said, the new Secretary of State will hold in his hands, perhaps, even the issue of our own survival. Be it said in fairness to Christian Herter that if our fate depends on him, it will be secure. He is a man of luminous mind, of high character, of vast experience in the diplomatic field, and of burning faith in freedom.

Let no one be deceived by his quiet exterior. He is a man of great determination, of real depth, and of tremendous conviction. Though he will speak softly—which, incidentally, could be a very good thing—he will move inexorably toward what ought to be our proper goal.

Mr. President, I believe Mr. Herter will utilize the United Nations fully. I believe he will make a very great effort to utilize the private economic system of the United States fully. I believe this represents one of the greatest lacks in all our foreign policy and one of the greatest examples of how we try to fight great battles with a minimum of our strength.

I believe also that he will give great consideration to the rule of law, as outlined by Mr. Charles Rhyne, the former president of the American Bar Association, and by Vice President NIXON in terms of the various media for that purpose which are available, including the International Court of Justice.

Finally, in personal terms, I think we shall see the State Department operating as a team. I do not believe that Secretary Herter is quite the virtuoso, in terms of the operation of the State Department, that the previous Secretary was. We all understand the strength, power, and talents of John Foster Dulles. They were unique with him.

I believe Mr. Herter brings to the task another talent, the talent of being able to captain, lead, and inspire a very effective team. I believe we shall hear again from the Policy Planning Staff of the Department of State, which I believe represents an extremely important aid to American foreign policy.

In short, while I have no rose tinted glasses with respect to any appointment as difficult and trying as this, I believe Secretary Herter's appointment is most auspicious for our country and for the cause of freedom in the world. I think the Russians will learn to count with him as effectively as they learned to count with John Foster Dulles.

I believe I have a right to say this, based upon the long and extremely sentimental—to me—attachment for and personal cooperation with Secretary Herter.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it was my privilege to serve in the House of Representatives with Representative Christian Herter, of Massachusetts. He was outstanding in many respects. Among other things, he headed a subcommittee which made one of the most constructive contributions which I witnessed during 14 years of service in that body. It was to a significant degree due to the work of the Herter committee that the Marshall plan was adopted.

During our service together he won my unstinted confidence. I have watched his work in the State Department. That confidence has in no way been impaired.

It is with pleasure that I rise to give this testimony to my colleagues in the Senate of my respect for, confidence in, and support of the man whose nomination is before us for confirmation, Mr. Christian A. Herter.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, too often men in public life are taken at the value they place upon themselves publicly. In the case of Secretary Herter we find a refreshing exception. This is a man whose gentleness and consideration for others may have led some to think of him as a person somewhat lacking in firmness, or in that degree of self-confidence which someone in a position so difficult and important as the one he is about to undertake must have.

Any such judgment would be a gross mistake. I am sure that no one who knows Christian Herter will ever for a moment make it.

Like so many of my colleagues in the Senate, I served with him for a number of years in the House. Our offices were adjoining for most of that time. Our friendship was close, as was our association in the work of the House of Representatives.

All that history need not be repeated. It has been gone into in detail, as it should have been.

This is a man whose upbringing and whose whole adult life seem to have been directed to the job which he now undertakes. As we wish him well, all of us who know him so well are happy that he is to succeed another great American in one of the most difficult jobs in the world today.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, Christian Herter will be a worthy successor to Secretary Dulles.

It was my privilege to know him well when we served as colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives. We sat on committees together. His career as a legislator and later as Governor of Massachusetts was one of devoted service.

He has a great capacity, he possesses a keen mind and he has an overriding passion to serve his country. I am personally gratified that Americans and the peoples of the free world will have the valuable qualities of his leadership.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Christian A. Herter of Massachusetts to be Secretary of State? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] are absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is detained on official business. If present and voting he would vote "yea."

WHEAT SURPLUSES

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the piling up of huge agricultural surpluses at great cost to the Government is a matter of deep concern to all of us. Recent figures indicate that the wheat surpluses will reach the outstanding figure of $3 billion worth.

The New York Times of last Sunday published a very interesting article, which is a little bit dreary in reading because it is filled with statistics, but it is an article which I think would bear reading by all of us who are greatly concerned with the problems faced by the Department of Agriculture and by us in Congress. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. WHEAT GLUT EXPECTED TO RISE—BUMPER 1958 AND 1959 CROPS LIKELY TO PUSH CARRYOVER TO NEW RECORD LEVELS—GOVERNMENT DISTURBED—IT HAS ABOUT 3 BILLIONS INVESTED IN THE GRAIN—NEW PROGRAM SOUGHT

(By J. H. Carmical)

The surplus wheat problem, with which Washington has been wrestling for years, promises to become more aggravated with the harvest of this year's crop. As a result, Congress may make some changes in the Government's wheat program at the present session.

Despite the expenditure of several billion dollars by the Government, the wheat surplus on July 1 will reach a new high of about 1,250 million bushels, of which some 90 percent will be held by the Government.

The carryover of wheat from previous crops reached a peak of 1,036,178,000 bushels on July 1, 1955. By restricting acreage and spending large sums to stimulate export sales, the Government reduced the surplus gradually to 880,600,000 bushels at the start of this season last July 1.

Last year's record harvest of 1,462 million bushels changed the picture drastically. Although both domestic consumption and exports of wheat this season have been high, indications are that the 1958 crop was about 380 million bushels more than the demand. This means that the carryover on July 1 will be that much greater than a year earlier.

The Department of Agriculture recently forecast this year's winter wheat crop at 966,236,000 bushels. Such a harvest would be sharply below the record of 1,179,924,000 bushels last year. But it would exceed the average of the last 10 years by some 150 million bushels.

ESTIMATE DUE LATER

The first estimate of the spring crop will not be issued until later. However, the spring crop normally is about one-fourth of the winter crop. Hence, a total wheat crop this year of a bit more than 1,200 million bushels seems in prospect.

This year's wheat acreage is much larger than that in 1958, when a sizable part of the land previously sown to wheat was put into the temporary soil bank. For this reason, generally favorable weather conditions in the next 2 or 3 months could result in an actual yield considerably above the present estimate.

On the basis of this estimate, the 1959 crop probably will result in a further sizable increase in carryover on July 1, 1960.

Domestic consumption of wheat next season is expected to be a few million bushels more than the 619 million bushels this season, probably amounting to about 625 million bushels. Exports are expected to be about 400 million bushels, some 60 million below this season's level.

With domestic consumption and exports expected to reach about 1,025 million bushels next season, the carryover on July 1, 1960, probably will be some 175 million bushels above the record level due next July 1.

The surplus problem is disturbing to Washington because the Government must buy the excess supplies of any crop. This year's crop is being supported at $1.81 a bushel on the farm, compared with $1.82 for the 1958 crop and $2 for that produced in 1957.

Indications are that the Government has some $3 billion invested in wheat. On April 3, the noncommitted inventory of the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Government's price-support agency, was 716,500,000 bushels of wheat. In addition, it had made loans on 607,238,000 bushels from last year's crop, of which 41,500,000 had been redeemed, leaving the net stock at 565,738,000 bushels.

With the export demand in April, May, and June expected to be about 125 million bushels, some of this net stock will be sold. But at the end of this season, the total holdings of the Government are expected to be some 1,150 million bushels. This would leave the free supply of wheat from previous crops on July 1 at about 100 million bushels.

How to dispose of this huge surplus, the largest ever held by this or any other Government, poses a knotty problem. International trade in wheat now is about 1,100 million bushels a season. United States exports this season, which are expected to reach 460 million bushels, are considered a fair share of the world market, particularly since Canada and some other exporting nations have large surpluses.

PEAK EXPORT SUPPLIES

It is estimated that the world's exportable supplies are the highest on record. This stems from the bumper crops generally raised by the exporting nations last year. Because of the vigorous competition for export outlets, the price of wheat generally is at the lowest level since the Korean War. Thus, it is held doubtful that further price concessions would greatly stimulate sales.

Several other exporting nations are objecting to the tactics the U.S. Government is using to sell wheat abroad. It is asserted that because of the foreign aid and other programs only 15 to 20 percent of the wheat sold abroad by the United States is sold in the regular commercial way, including wheat sold under Federal subsidy payments.

Government officials and farm leaders generally feel that the wheat program has failed. Many are striving for new legislation.

Generally, it is held that the present support price, although much lower than that of a few years ago, is at a level that encourages maximum production and discourages the use of wheat as a livestock feed. Also, it is held that to continue trying to dispose of excess supplies in the export market by direct subsidies, barter transactions, foreign currency sales and outright donations not only would be costly, but would not solve the problem.

NEW PLAN POSSIBLE

Because of the dissatisfaction with the present program Congress may come up with a new plan at this session. President Eisenhower has called on Congress to junk the present program, and his Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra T. Benson, is plugging for a new setup.

Generally, Mr. Benson would like a program that would base the support price on the market price for the 3 preceding years and that would provide some relaxation in acreage controls.

Once the price supports fell to a level that would make wheat competitive with other feed grains, which would result in greater consumption of wheat, it is said that acreage controls could be scrapped.

If some such plan is not evolved, Mr. Benson believes that there should be a drastic reduction in the national acreage allotment in order to bring production down to a level that would permit an easing of the surplus burden.

Generally, it is considered likely that Congress will pass some wheat legislation at this session, but it is too early to predict the character of the legislation or whether it will be approved by President Eisenhower.

NORTH DAKOTA'S WHEAT

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD, following the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], a GTA Daily Radio Roundup of April 14, 1959.

There being no objection, the Daily Radio Roundup was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GTA DAILY RADIO ROUNDUP, TUESDAY, APRIL 14, 1959

North Dakota, where the Nation's finest wheat is grown, is caught in an acreage squeeze. So are other traditional good wheat areas of the country. The situation isn't understood very well except by the farmers who are being administered out of their acreage allotments.

Veteran North Dakota Senator MILTON YOUNG explains what is happening, in a recent newsletter that is of interest to all wheatgrowers. What's happening in North Dakota is typical.

Senator YOUNG says that North Dakota's planted wheat acreage has dropped from about 10 million acres in 1939 down to 6.5 million in 1958 because quotas have been cut.

At the same time, wheat production in the noncommercial wheat areas of the United States has increased. These areas get better yields and often a better price because they are closer to market. Of course, the wheat is inferior in quality.

Any farmer anywhere can plant and sell up to 15 acres of wheat without coming under acreage allotment and marketing quota laws. He can grow up to 30 acres if he feeds it right on his own farm.

But when Uncle Sam figures out total U.S. wheat acreage he has to count in these small plots and because total acreage is set at 55 million acres somebody has to give up acres. So far it's been subtracted from the commercial areas like North Dakota where the land is particularly suited to wheat production. And that is a situation that needs correcting.

Oddly enough, Senator YOUNG says, foreign people have a strong preference for soft wheat. Producers of soft wheat have done much more to sell their wheat abroad than producers of hard, high protein wheat. They have practically no surplus problem, and much more favorable cash prices. On February 19, 1959, the price support at Portland, Oreg., for soft wheat was $2.05 and the cash price $2.18. The price support at Baltimore for soft red winter wheat was $2.26 and the cash price $2.20. At Minneapolis the support price for No. 1 Dark Northern Spring Wheat was $2.20 and the cash price $2.08.

On top of that, Senator YOUNG says, North Dakota and the upper Midwest have lost their once-good market for feed grains in the New England States. The support price for oats at Crosby, N. Dak., this year will be approximately 38 cents a bushel, and the freight rate to Boston is 45 cents, or more than the price of the oats. Most of New England's feed grains are now obtained from States that are closer and consequently, have cheaper freight rates, and from Canada, which has subsidized export freight rates.

So these things add up to a squeeze on our upper Midwest farmers. But at the same time they are expanding into the livestock business. According to Senator YOUNG they can produce a pound of beef or pork cheaper than it can be done in Iowa or Illinois. And here again the co-ops are moving to give the farmers the kind of top service they need. That's why GTA is in the feed business in a big way. It is not only manufacturing and supplying top quality feeds, but using homegrown grains at home.. This is a double-barreled saving for farmers.

But that's the job co-ops were cut out to do—to serve the farmers in every way possible—GTA, the co-op way.

TEENAGE TRAFFIC SAFETY CONFERENCE

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the matter of traffic safety and traffic education in the United States is one of the most serious problems that confronts our people today.

Over 40,000 people die each year as a result of traffic accidents. Untold misery and millions of dollars are lost because of reckless, careless, and inconsiderate driving on the part of many automobile drivers.

The District Commissioners' Traffic Coordinating Committee and the Metropolitan Traffic Area Council have been conducting an energetic campaign of traffic safety and traffic education. Yesterday, Gen. A. C. Welling, Engineer Commissioner, met with religious leaders of the four major faiths, Protestant, Catholic, Greek Orthodox, and Jew, to discuss a religious weekend in traffic safety education, preceding the Memorial Day weekend, which has been a time so destructive in the matter of traffic fatalities and accidents.

From the third issue of the District of Columbia Traffic Safety Reporter, edited by Anthony L. Ellison, there appears an interesting editorial on the plight of a pedestrian in Washington traffic. It also contains an interesting article on the District of Columbia teenage traffic safety conference, in which they recommend a 12-point safety program to the District Commissioners. It is gratifying to note that in this era of concern for juvenile delinquency, we find on the constructive side teenagers who so capably concern themselves with traffic problems.

Mr. President, I bring these items to the attention of the Members of Congress for their information, and for the guidance of those interested in traffic safety in other parts of the country. I ask unanimous consent that the article and editorial be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bantam rooster was scratching around in the stall of a large percheron horse. When the horse got restless and started moving around, the rooster looked up at the horse and said, "We'd better be careful, brother, or we're liable to step on one another's toes."

This story reminds us of the plight of the harried pedestrian in Washington traffic. Of course, the pedestrian has "rights" in traffic but he must make very certain they do not become his last "rites."

In a recent editorial entitled "Unsafe Safety Zone", the Washington Evening Star said:

"The alarming increase in deaths and injuries among Washington's pedestrians calls for a crackdown on those responsible. Crosswalks are supposed to be safety zones for persons crossing the streets, but an analysis of this year's accidents has revealed that they are far from safe for pedestrians. * * * Since pedestrians by law are supposed to have the right of way in crosswalks, motorists must shoulder the major part of the blame for the increase in deaths in 1959. * * * The proposal that motorists arrested for inflicting injuries on pedestrians be prohibited from forfeiting collateral—as they are permitted to do in many cases now—is a good first step toward better enforcement."

In the meantime, can't we motorists be more tolerant of the pedestrian? Sure, he has his faults * * * but are they crimes punishable by death?

Some 150 high school delegates to the sixth annual District of Columbia teenage traffic safety conference on March 25 presented a 12-point safety program to the District Commissioners.

The young delegates heard Congressman WALTER E. ROGERS, Democrat, of Texas tell them: "You have the whole world in your hands."

Representative ROGERS, who has been a member of the House of Representatives subcommittee considering traffic safety since its inception, emphasized that young drivers can point the way to the solution of America's monumental traffic accident problem.

Under the chairmanship of Raymond Kemp of Gonzaga High School, the student delegates considered and proposed 12 steps toward accident prevention in the District of Columbia. They recommended:

1. That the Department of Motor Vehicles take steps to help organize a permanent District of Columbia teenage traffic safety council.

2. That greater interest in traffic safety be promoted among the various Parent-Teacher Associations and that the PTA's in turn cooperate with the student bodies of their respective schools.

3. That the driver's permit be renewed only after comprehensive reexamination.

4. That further research be carried out to develop more effective methods of testing driver attitudes and emotional stability, which are important in traffic accident prevention.

5. That the District Government forbid the sale of alcoholic beverages to persons under the age of 21 and that particular emphasis be placed on the effects of driving after drinking in both the driver education course and the general high school curriculum.

6. That all persons convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol be required by law to attend a special course on the effects of alcohol on driving ability.

7. That the driver education course be required of all persons under 18 years of age before they are licensed to drive.

8. That qualitative standards for instruction in commercial driving schools be established and regulated by the District government.

9. That more rigid and comprehensive written and road tests be required in driver licensing.

10. That the Metropolitan Police Department enforce pedestrian regulations more rigidly.

11. That "walk" and "don't walk" traffic signs be placed at additional strategic intersections in the city.

12. That additional traffic safety posters be placed at strategic street locations, particularly at uncontrolled intersections.

Following the conference, Lt. Col. Jess P. Unger, Assistant Engineer Commissioner, announced that the 12 conference recommendations will be distributed to the District Department heads concerned and then discussed at a future meeting of the Commissioners' Traffic Coordinating Committee, of which he is chairman.

"I was most impressed by the serious attitude of these young people in discussing the traffic problem and I feel that their recommendations are worthy of equally serious consideration by us," he said.

Represented at the conference were some 25 public, parochial, and private senior high schools located in Washington.

District of Columbia Commissioners, Robert E. McLaughlin, David B. Karrick, and Brig. Gen. Alvin C. Welling; Deputy Superintendent of Schools Lawson J. Cantrell; Msgr. Thomas W. Lyons, Assistant Archdiocesan Director of Education, and George A. England, Director of Motor Vehicles, greeted the delegates at the opening of the conference.

The morning session featured group discussions on youth organizations, driving attitudes, physical fitness for driving, traffic laws, driver education and pedestrian safety.

Chairmen of the student group discussions were: Dick Fitzgerald, Gonzaga; Elmer Holt, Wilson; Raymond Kemp, Gonzaga; Patricia Norgorden, Anacostia; Jim Gildea, Gonzaga; and Joan Wallace, Immaculate Conception.

THE HEALTH FOR PEACE BILL

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, as one of the cosponsors of the health for peace bill, I urge the Members of Congress to give serious consideration to its passage.

This bill has 59 cosponsors from both sides of the aisle, and its purpose is to create a new impetus to medical research. A very excellent analysis of the scientific teamwork behind the health for peace bill was written by Howard A. Rusk, M.D., associate editor of the New York Times, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ANALYSIS OF SCIENTIFIC TEAMWORK BEHIND THE HEALTH FOR PEACE BILLS

(By Howard A. Rusk, M.D.)

Last Monday Senator LISTER HILL, Democrat, of Alabama, reintroduced in the Senate his bill to expand U.S. support of international medical research. In a strong show of bipartisan support, 59 of Senator HILL's colleagues joined him in cosponsoring the legislation.

Representative JOHN FOGARTY, Democrat, of Rhode Island, has also reintroduced a similar bill in the House of Representatives.

This legislation, known popularly as the health for peace bill, would create within the National Institutes of Health a new National Institute of International Medical Research with an annual appropriation of $50 million.

These funds would be used to encourage and support research and the exchange of information on research, the training of research personnel and the improvement of research facilities throughout the world.

The bill would authorize grants to support such activities ranging from research in basic science to research in rehabilitation. Grants could be made to foreign and American universities and research organizations and to voluntary and governmental international agencies such as the World Health Organization.

Under the plan, a National Advisory Council for International Medical Research, composed of nongovernmental leaders, would establish policies, make recommendations and approve grants and loans under the program.

COUNCILS WOULD ADVISE

The existing specialized advisory councils on heart, cancer, arthritis and metabolic diseases, neurological diseases and blindness, vocational rehabilitation, and similar specialized fields would advise the new National Advisory Council for International Medical Research on specific projects within their particular area of interest and competence.

The program would not replace any of our current programs of multilateral international health activities through the World Health Organization or UNICEF or any of our bilateral activities conducted through the International Cooperation Administration.

Nor would it supplant the research programs being conducted through the International Cooperation Administration.

Nor would it supplant the research programs being conducted in the United States through the National Institutes of Health. It would enhance these activities and at the same time provide a mechanism and funds for uniting science throughout the world in a greatly expanded global attack on disease and disability.

The key factor in grants from the new National Institute for International Medical Research over and above the usual criteria applied to research projects, would be their international implications.

Although there are innumerable corollary values in Senator HILL's proposal, it is based primarily on recognition of the fact that medical research is so highly complex and interrelated that victory over any disease or disability can be achieved only through the research results of many scientists throughout the world.

FULL OF EXAMPLES

The history of medicine is replete with examples of this.

It was a Dutch scientist in 1676 who first revealed the world of micro-organisms. An English physician, Edward Jenner, who observed in 1796 that vaccination prevented smallpox, provided the basis for modern immunological concepts.

Iwanowski, a Russian, identified the first virus in 1892. Two Canadians, Sir Frederick Banting and Charles Best, were the first to isolate insulin in 1921.

The Spanish neuronanatomist, Santiago Ramon y Cajal, and the Italian histologist, Camillo Golgi, shared the Nobel Prize in 1906 for their work on the structure of the nervous system. The list goes on and on—penicillin from England, cortisone from the United States, rauwolfia from India, sulfonamides from Germany.

The health for peace bill is a direct outgrowth of the proposals of President Eisenhower in his 1958 state of the Union message for a science for peace plan to attain a good life for all. As the first step in such a plan, President Eisenhower at that time invited the Soviet Union to join in the current 5-year program for the global eradication of malaria.

The President then stated our willingness to pool our efforts with the Russians in other campaigns against cancer and heart disease and the other scourges of mankind. "If the people can get together on such projects," he said, "is it not possible that we could then go on a full-scale cooperative program of science for peace?"

DISCUSSED IN MOSCOW

It was to discuss the proposals for a greatly expanded international medical research program that Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, went to Moscow in early December for his now famous 8-hour interview with Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev. The first 2 hours of the interview were spent discussing international medical research.

In a statement issued in Moscow after the interview, Senator HUMPHREY reported the Soviet Premier had given enthusiastic approval to the proposal.

He said further: "During my interview with the Premier, I had noted that areas of disagreement between our respective foreign policies remain broad and deep. It does not appear that, for a considerable time, these differences will be resolved. In the meantime, we need to learn how to work together, and the best place to start is in the nonpolitical area. The world is hungry for some evidence of effective Soviet-American collaboration. One of the best areas in which to start is in the field of health."

The fact that 59 other Senators joined with Senator HILL in cosponsoring his health for peace bill indicates that a majority of the Senate agree with the statement of Senator HUMPHREY on the need for such a program and with Senator HILL that his proposals would help meet that need.

They realize that not only will such a program improve international understanding but also may well provide a breakthrough on the killing and crippling diseases that plague mankind.

Every citizen in the United States has a personal stake in this program.

The enthusiastic congressional support of the health for peace bill gives dimension and significance to the aphorism of the late Sir William Osler, who once said: "The great republic of medicine knows and has known no national boundaries."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, Dr. Rusk appeared before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on Tuesday, February 24, giving a valuable testimony in support of this measure. I should like to quote a portion of his remarks, as follows:

The International Health and Medical Research Act of 1959 is essentially a humanitarian program directed toward a global assault on mankind's most important enemies—disease and disability. But it has tremendous political implications for its rehabilitation aspects emphasize our belief in the United States of America that man's mission on earth is to heal and not to hurt, to build and not to destroy.

It is most significant that when your chairman, Senator HILL, introduced the International Health and Medical Research Act of 1959, 59 of you gentlemen here and your colleagues in the Senate joined him in cosponsoring this important legislation. Today there is widespread interest and support of this legislation in all walks of life in the United States. The people of the United States have demonstrated, through their willingness to contribute both tax and voluntary funds, their firm belief in the value of research in health, medicine, and rehabilitation. Most, I am confident, will also agree that while we and the rest of the world are spending billions of dollars for research for instruments of death and destruction in our struggle for survival, we should spend a few millions positively on promoting health, happiness and human understanding in our struggle for peace.

Over 300 years ago an English philosopher once said, "If every man would but mend a man, the world would all be mended." The International Health and Medical Research Act of 1959 is a significant step toward this goal.

AWARD TO THE A. W. LUCAS CO.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, this past week I had the pleasure of visiting with a very fine and distinguished citizen of North Dakota, my good friend Hon. R. Fay Brown, of the A. W. Lucas Co., department store, Bismarck, N. Dak., who had just returned from New York City to accept on behalf of the company the award for being named the Brand Name Retailer of the Year, of department stores in class II category for this award.

Mr. President, that is quite an honor for North Dakota, since the A. W. Lucas Co. was voted the best in the Nation. While in New York, Mr. Brown visited with the Honorable Henry Abt, president of the Brand Names Foundation, and Fred Newell, Jr., director of the retail relations, who have done so much in bringing brand names of products before the people of America.

Mr. President, not only is Mr. Brown a prominent member and manager of the A. W. Lucas Co. which won this outstanding award, but he has been, for a number of years, a very fine member of the House of Representatives of the North Dakota State Legislature.

I offer my congratulations to R. Fay Brown and the A. W. Lucas Co. for receiving this fine award of the Brand Name Retailer of the Year.

I ask unanimous consent that an article in the Bismarck Capital of March 20, 1959, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LUCAS, CORWIN'S SCORE IN NATIONAL RETAIL CONTEST

A. W. Lucas Co. in Bismarck was notified this week of winning the Nation's highest retail award, Brand Name Retailer of the Year for 1958 in the Brand Names Foundation's department stores—class II category.

Corwin Churchill Motors, Inc., also won national recognition in receiving a certificate of distinction in the automobile dealers category.

Both stores received notification by telegraph from the foundation. Eli Torrance of Lucas Co., and Charles J. Whittey, of Corwin-Churchill, will receive the awards during a dinner in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel April 15.

The banquet will be attended by more than 1,500 business and civic leaders, climaxing Brand Names Week, April 12–19.

Winners are chosen by a panel of judges composed of the top award winners of the previous year.

To select the winners, the panel examined comprehensive presentations of their 1958 activities submitted by more than 550 retailers who had been selected as finalists and given an opportunity to compete for the awards. Finalists were screened from 49 States, District of Columbia, Hawaii, and Canada.

In judging, the panel's decisions were made primarily on the firm's 1958 brand advertising and promotional campaigns, as well as their education of customers and personnel about the basic policy of featuring manufacturers' advertised brands.

R. Fay Brown, manager of the A. W. Lucas Co., said Tuesday that this is the fifth—and highest—Brand Names award won by the A. W. Lucas Co. since the firm won a certificate of distinction in 1948. Since then it has won two second place and two third place awards in its class, he said.

The winning merchants, their families, and business associates will be honored during a 3-day celebration in New York City, April 13, 14, and 15, by civic officials, brand manufacturers, publications, and trade associations.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, after consultation with the minority leader, who in turn had consultations with the distinguished Senators from North Carolina and Massachusetts, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the Ervin amendment be limited to 20 minutes, 10 minutes to each side.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, but only for the purpose of inquiry, it is my understanding that there are no more speeches to be made on this side of the aisle on the Ervin amendment. I have been informed that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has 10 minutes, and the Senator from Massachusetts has 10 minutes, one to speak on one side of the question, and one on the other side.

After consultation with the Senator from Arizona, so far as I know this arrangement will be agreeable. So at the end of 20 minutes there will be a vote on the Ervin amendment to strike title VI from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the agreement is entered.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I shall be brief. I hope Senators will remain in the Chamber to hear what I shall say in behalf of the amendment and what the Senator from Massachusetts will say in opposition to the amendment.

As a member of the McClellan committee, I have been astounded by the revelations of conditions which exist in what I believe to be a minority of the unions of the Nation. Nevertheless, those unions represent several million persons who are employed in industries affecting commerce within the meaning of the Taft-Hartley Act. We have found that custodians of union treasuries have taken enormous sums of money from those treasuries in order to enrich themselves and their cronies. After robbing the treasuries, the custodians have destroyed the financial records of those unions in order that their misdeeds might be concealed from the members, law-enforcement officers, and tax authorities.

Furthermore, custodians of union treasuries have taken vast sums of money from those treasuries and devoted them to purposes which had no connection with the objectives of the unions to which the moneys belonged. For example, in one instance more than $60,000 was extracted from a union treasury to pay for the defense of a union officer who misused his union office to extort money from others in order to enrich himself personally. The union in question had no legal interest whatever in his defense.

In addition to malpractices of this nature, the committee found that in a number of unions investigated by it the rank-and-file members had no more voice in their affairs than do the subjects of totalitarian dictators. We found that in many instances the members of the unions had been robbed of any voice whatever in the management of the affairs of their unions or in the selection of their officers.

The committee found an unbelievable condition to exist in the largest union in the United States, the Teamsters, whose membership totals 1,500,000. Men who had been convicted of armed robbery, of burglary, of extortion, and other serious crimes had been given positions of authority over the honest rank and file members of that union right after their release from prison and before they had indicated any repentance of their crimes. That condition existed not only in the Teamsters Union but also in a number of other unions which were investigated.

The first five titles of the bill are adequately adapted to prevent or punish these malpractices upon rank and file union members, my amendment proposes to strike out provisions relating to the Taft-Hartley Act which have no connection whatever with these malpractices in the internal affairs of unions.

When the Kennedy-Ives bill was before the Senate last year, the Senate passed that bill with some nongermane Taft-Hartley amendments attached, two of which are retained in the bill now before the Senate. In my judgment, the Kennedy-Ives bill was defeated in the House last summer because the bill included nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. The bill now before the Senate is likewise saddled with six nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, which arouse unnecessary opposition to it.

Why should the right of rank and file union members to get relief from such internal malpractices as have been disclosed by the McClellan committee be jeopardized by including in the bill amendments which have no relationship whatever to the main objective of the bill, which is to prevent or punish such malpractices?

The purpose of my amendment is to strike out the nongermane Taft-Hartley amendments, which stir up unnecessary opposition to the bill. There are no proposals for amendment of the Taft-Hartley law which are noncontroversial, because industry, on the one hand, and labor, on the other hand, have been arguing about virtually all the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law since 1947, when it was enacted.

Let us remove from the pending bill the Taft-Hartley provisions. Let us make this bill for the protection of those who have no protection: the rank and file of union members who have the misfortune to hold membership in unions which are dominated by either dictatorial officers or corrupt officers.

The committee found, in addition, that on occasions corrupt union leaders and equally corrupt management had entered into agreements under which the union leaders had "sold down the river" those whom they were supposed to represent. The bill contains adequate provisions to correct that practice and put an end to it.

Let us not jeopardize the right of the rank and file of labor by saddling the bill with numerous nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. If that is done, we shall be endangering the passage of the bill. We shall be making it certain that the Taft-Hartley Act will be mangled on the floor of the Senate and the floor of the House.

It is significant that six members of the McClellan committee have spoken on the bill. Five of the six have advocated the adoption of my amendment, because they are convinced that it is not wise to endanger the passage of a bill protecting rank and file union members who now have no protection, merely to secure the adoption of a few partial amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. The Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee has created an outstanding advisory body consisting of 12 persons, 3 of whom represent labor, 3 of whom represent management, and 6 of whom represent the general public. That body is to study the entire field of the Taft-Hartley Act and make recommendations to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare concerning amendments which should be made to the act. Why not leave all questions arising under the Taft-Hartley law which are not germane to the major purpose of the pending bill to the consideration of the special advisory body of experts and the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for further study, instead of acting on them in piecemeal fashion such as is proposed in title VI?

To create an advisory body composed of 12 outstanding experts in this field for a complete study of the Taft-Hartley Act, and then to undertake to make changes in the Taft-Hartley Act without waiting for that committee to study the subject and report on it, is about as wise as calling for a physician to come and treat a person for some ailment, and then have the person undertake to treat himself for the ailment while the physician is en route to the person's house for that purpose.

The rank-and-file members of unions controlled by dictatorial union officers or by corrupt union officers are entitled to immediate relief. If we saddle the bill with nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, we shall jeopardize the prospect of their securing that relief.

On the contrary, Mr. President, if my amendment is adopted and if all nongermane Taft-Hartley amendments are excluded from the bill, Congress will be able to pass the bill with a minimum of delay, and speedily make it law.

Then the special advisory body and the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare can study the entire Taft-Hartley Act field, and a proper bill can be brought forth to deal with it in an adequate manner. It seems to me that is the sensible thing to do. As I have said, any other course will confront us with the danger of one or the other of two unpleasant alternatives: Either to have no legislation at all, as happened last year; or to have a Taft-Hartley Act which will be considerably mangled because it will be rewritten upon the floor of the Congress, rather than in committee. For these reasons, I urge the Senate to adopt my amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

I shall briefly explain why the provisions of title VI are included in the bill.

When the bill was originally introduced, last year, it contained only the first five titles of the bill which now is before us.

The sixth title, which deals with changes in the Taft-Hartley Act, was not in the original bill. But when the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Mitchell, came before the committee, in making his original recommendations he suggested that we cover all the points which now are covered by title VI.

When the pension and welfare bill was before the Senate in April 1958, and when the committee agreed that it would report a reform bill, Senator Smith of New Jersey, then the ranking Republican member of the committee, insisted on including, as a part of the agreement, an understanding that we would also consider including in the bill the changes in the Taft-Hartley Act the Secretary of Labor had recommended. We agreed to do so; and in committee we agreed to report the bill in much the same form as that of the bill which now is before the Senate.

In January of this year, the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Mitchell, testified before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and again recommended that these provisions be included in the bill. So when I say that this title of the bill is not controversial, I mean that it is not controversial as between the Secretary of Labor and the majority of the membership of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Title VI contains six general provisions.

The first deals with the "no man's land." The fact is that the "no man's land" provisions are wholly germane to the bill, and constituted the fifth recommendation of the McClellan committee, in its first annual report. The Senate should deal with the question of the "no man's land"; and it is dealt with by section 601 of this bill, under the umbrella and in the context of dealing with the recommendations of the McClellan committee.

However, if the Senate were to adopt the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], this part of title VI would be stricken out.

The second section of title VI relates to the building and construction trades. This part of title VI is in somewhat different form from the recommendation made last year by the Secretary of Labor. The corresponding proposal last year was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 60 to 29.

This section of title VI is substantially the same as a bill introduced in 1951 by Senators Taft, Nixon, Humphrey, and Cain, and passed by the Senate on May 12, 1952. It is substantially the same as an amendment adopted by the Senate in 1954 by a voice vote at a time when the Senate was in the control of the Republican Members; and the amendment was offered by Senator Smith of New Jersey, then the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. This matter is one which we have been considering for 8 years. The practices dealt with by this part of title VI have exposed the building and construction industry to all kinds of corruption and back-door deals. Last year the Senate agreed, by a vote of 2 to 1, to deal with this matter. I believe, as Senator Taft and others did many years ago, that action should be taken to adjust the Taft-Hartley Act to the peculiar conditions in the construction industry.

The third section of title VI relates to economic strikers. It relates to a 1947 amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act, which inserted certain language in section 9(c)(3). In the 1952 campaign, President Eisenhower himself spoke against that "union busting" provision; and in a special labor message in 1954, the President recommended that a change be made in the provision.

The difficulty which this amendment is designed to rectify occurs when employees go on strike, and the company undertakes to employ replacements, and is able to resume normal production, by using a number of new employees, as well as certain of the returned strikers. Under such circumstances the union is virtually deprived of any bargaining power; and if a representation election is held the union loses, because it is not likely that the replacement workers will vote for the union. This amendment would permit the NLRB to decide when and under what circumstances it would be desirable for economic strikers to vote.

So this proposed amendment, which previously was unanimously adopted by the Senate, on the suggestion of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], deals with a problem which for the past several years has been the subject of a considerable amount of consideration by the President of the United States and by a number of others.

The next part of title VI deals with prehearing elections. This is a provision which was before the Senate in different form last year. This matter was brought up this year as a result of a number of cases which demonstrated the desirability of instituting such prehearing elections. One of the outstanding examples was the Coffey Transfer Co. case, which was brought before the McClellan committee.

Furthermore, during the year 1958, a firm of management consultants—McKinsey & Co.—was retained by the National Labor Relations Board to survey its internal procedures; and that firm of consultants issued a report which incorporated certain recommendations, including reinstitution of the prehearing election.

In the Coffey Transfer case, the election was delayed for so long that finally it became apparent that the union would drive Mr. Coffey out of business. Finally, Mr. Coffey was driven out of business.

As a result of many experiences of that sort, the National Labor Relations Board has indicated that this is one of the most important provisions which could be adopted in order to speed up the procedures of the Board and in order to do equity to both labor and management. I believe that after considering the matter the Senate will agree that the adoption of this provision is long overdue. I point out that this provision has the recommendation and the support of the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, Mr. Leedom, who on several occasions has stated, before the committee, that this provision will speed the procedures of the Board.

The next provision of title VI deals with the so-called service assistants in the communications industry. A redefinition of the term "supervisor" was adopted by the Senate last year by a vote of 47 to 36. That provision was not a very satisfactory one, and our committee has now rewritten it restricting its impact very considerably. As rewritten, it deals only with a relatively small number of employees who should not be included in the term "supervisor" but who under certain recent decisions of the Board are in danger of being removed from bargaining units in which they are now included.

The next part of title VI would permit the President to designate an officer or employee of the general counsel's office to serve as an acting general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board. This provision is simply a housekeeping one. There is some precedent for it, and I believe it is in the public interest.

Mr. Presdent, in my opinion, those provisions of title VI will aid in getting a labor reform bill enacted this year. If I thought otherwise, I would vote against title VI.

However, the bill faces a difficult time on the floor of the Senate and in the other body. I believe title VI will help secure favorable action on the bill. I believe that all these provisions of title VI are important.

Therefore, much as I admire the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], and much as I appreciate his very considerable help in connection with the bill, I hope his amendment will be rejected.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time under my control.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, has all remaining time been yielded back?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). That is correct.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] are absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] would each vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON].

If present and voting the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea" and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 67, as follows:

So Mr. ERVIN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I call up an amendment in the nature of a substitute for all of title VI, on which the Senate just voted. Instead of having the substitute amendment read at length, I ask unanimous consent that it be stated by title and printed in the RECORD, and then I will make a brief explanation, because I doubt whether a long-winded speech on my part is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated in brief by the clerk.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out title VI, which begins on line 14, page 54, and ends on line 25, page 59, and to insert in lieu thereof a new title VI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Illinois that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that the amendment be printed in the RECORD?

There being no objection, Mr. DIRKSEN'S amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITLE V—LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

SEC. 501. (a) Section 3(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding after the period at the end thereof the following: "Not more than three members of the Board shall be members of the same political party."

(b) Section 3(d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding after the period at the end thereof the following language: "In case of a vacancy in the office of the General Counsel the President shall designate the officer or employee who shall serve as General Counsel during such vacancy."

SEC. 502. (a) Section 6 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is redesignated "6(a)" and is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection (b):

"(b) (1) The Board, in its discretion, may, by rule or otherwise, decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute where, in the opinion of the Board, the effect of such labor dispute on commerce is not sufficiently substantial to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction.

"(2) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to prevent or bar any agency or the courts of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands), from assuming and asserting jurisdiction over labor disputes over which the Board declines, pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection, to assert jurisdiction."

SEC. 503. (a) Section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4)(i) to engage in, or to induce or encourage any individual employed by any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in, a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services; or

"(ii) to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce.

where an object thereof is: (A) forcing or requiring any employer or self-employed person to join any labor or employer organization; (B) forcing or requiring any person to cease, or to agree to cease, using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease, or to agree to cease, doing business with any other person, or forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9; (C) forcing or requiring any employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees if another labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9; (D) forcing or requiring any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another labor organization or in another trade, craft, or class, unless such employer is failing to conform to an order or certification of the Board determining the bargaining representative for employees performing such work: Provided, That nothing contained in this subsection (b) shall be construed to make unlawful a refusal by any person to enter upon the premises of any employer (other than his own employer), if the employees of such employer are engaged in a strike ratified or approved by a representative of such employees whom such employer is required to recognize under this Act: Provided further, That nothing contained in clause (B) of this paragraph (4) shall be construed to make unlawful where not otherwise unlawful (i) any strike against, or refusal to perform services for, any person who has contracted or agreed with an employer to perform for such employer work which he is unable to perform because his employees are engaged in a strike not unlawful under this Act; or (ii) any strike or refusal to perform services at the site of the construction, alteration, painting, or repair of a building, structure, or other work and directed at any of several employers who are in the construction industry and are jointly engaged as joint venturers or in the relationship of contractors and subcontractors in such construction, alteration, painting, or repair at such site, and there is a labor dispute, not unlawful under this Act or in violation of an existing collective bargaining contract, relating to the wages, hours, or other working conditions of employees employed at such site by any of such employers."

(b) Section 303(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) It shall be unlawful, for the purpose of this section only, in an industry or activity affecting commerce, for any labor organization to engage in any activity or conduct defined as an unfair labor practice in section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended."

SEC. 504. (a) Subsection (b) of section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (5), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6), and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and", and by adding a new paragraph as follows:

"(7) to picket or cause to be picketed, or threaten to picket or cause to be picketed, any employer with the object of forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees, or forcing or requiring the employees of an employer to accept or select such labor organization as their collective bargaining representative:

"(A) where the employer has recognized in accordance with this Act any other labor organization and a question concerning representation may not appropriately be raised under section 9(c) of this Act; or

"(B) where within the preceding twelve months a valid election under section 9(c) of this Act has been conducted; or

"(C) where the labor organization cannot establish that there is a sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having such labor organization represent them for collective bargaining purposes; or

"(D) where such picketing has been engaged in for a reasonable period of time and at the expiration of such period an election under section 9(c) has not been conducted.

"(E) Nothing in this paragraph (7) shall be construed to permit any act which would otherwise be an unfair labor practice under this section 8."

(b) Subsection (1) of section 10 of such Act is amended by striking out the first sentence and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of paragraph (4)(A), (B), or (C), or paragraph (7) of section 8(b), the preliminary investigation of such charge shall be made forthwith and given priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred."

SEC. 505. Section 8(d) of such Act is amended by striking out all of the language after the colon at the end of paragraph (4) and in lieu thereof inserting the following: "The duties imposed upon employers, employees, and labor organizations by paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) shall become inapplicable upon an intervening certification of the Board under which the labor organization or individual, which is a party to the contract, has been superseded as or ceased to be the representative of the employees subject to the provisions of section 9(a), and the duties so imposed shall not be construed as requiring either party to a contract for a fixed period to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions of employment whether or not embodied in such contract, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract. Any employee who engages in a strike within the sixty-day period specified in this subsection shall lose his status as an employee of the employer engaged in the particular labor dispute, for the purposes of sections 8, 9, and 10 of this Act, as amended, but such loss of status for such employee shall terminate if and when he is reemployed by such employer."

SEC. 506. (a) Section 9(c)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by inserting the word "or" after the semicolon at the end of clause (B) and adding a new clause "(C)" as follows:

"(C) by an employer primarily engaged in the building and construction industry and a labor organization acting in behalf of employees engaged (or who, upon their employment, will be engaged) in the building and construction industry, asserting that such employer recognizes such labor organization as the representative defined in section 9(a) and has entered into a collective bargaining agreement with such labor organization;".

(b) Such subsection is further amended by inserting a colon before the period at the end thereof and adding the following language: "Provided, That the Board may, without prior thereto having conducted an election by secret ballot, certify a labor organization referred to in clause (C) of this paragraph as the exclusive representative of employees of an employer referred to in said clause (C) in such unit as the Board may find is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other conditions of employment: Provided further, That the preceding proviso shall not apply where there is no history of a collective bargaining relationship between the petitioning employer and labor organization prior to the current agreement or an employee or group of employees or any individual or labor organization acting in their behalf allege, and the Board finds, that a substantial number of employees presently employed by the employer in the bargaining unit assert that the labor organization is not a representative as defined in section 9(a)."

SEC. 507. Section 9(c)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out all of the second sentence thereof.

SEC. 508. Section 9(c)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the Board from conducting elections prior to hearing where the Board finds no substantial objection to such proceeding is being made or the waiving of hearings by stipulation for the purpose of a consent election in conformity with the regulations and rules of decision of the Board."

SEC. 509. No provision of this title shall be deemed to make an unfair labor practice any act which was performed prior to the effective date of this title which did not constitute an unfair labor practice prior thereto.

SEC. 510. The amendments made by this title shall take effect sixty days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if the proposed substitute amendment, just called up, has been printed, so that we may have copies of it to follow?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the substitute amendment contains nearly all of title V in Senate bill 748, which was the administration bill and which was under consideration by the committee. The only change is that the section relating to the Communist affidavit has been stricken because it is treated elsewhere in the bill now under consideration. Other than that, the substitute contains all of title V of Senate bill 748. I think copies of that bill are available. If not, they can be made available.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Senate bill 748, which was introduced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and other Senators.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator refers to title V of that bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; to title V.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If we have before us title V of S. 748 we can follow the Senator in his discussion?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, may we have order so that we can hear the Senators?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest that the staff provide copies of S. 748 to Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I will briefly run through the items in the substitute amendment, and I shall try to make the explanation as plain as possible.

The first provision in the substitute amendment relates to the vacancy in the Office of the General Counsel. As the matter stands now, there is difficulty, and sometimes the Board has been immobilized for a certain length of time because unless there was action on the nomination of a successor when the General Counsel resigned, the office was vacant. Since the office was clothed with specific authority that caused some difficulty. Therefore, the provision in the substitute amendment is that the President may designate an officer or employee to serve as General Counsel during any vacancy.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Will the Senator tell us from what page he is reading?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am reading from subsection (b) on page 58 of Senate bill 748.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator. The amendment is not printed, and this will give us a chance to follow the explanation of the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the second item in the substitute amendment relates to the so-called no man's land difficulty we have encountered under the National Labor Relations Board, which was so freely and generously ventilated in connection with the discussion of the labor bill last year.

The matter crystallized somewhat because of the case in Utah of a small blueprinting company which really did not have a sufficient number of employees to affect commerce, and the National Labor Relations Board refused to take jurisdiction of the case. It was a good deal like the fellow up in Tewksbury, Mass., who at a ripe old age passed away. He went to Heaven and St. Peter said, "You can't stay here." Then he went down below, and the Devil said, "Sorry, you can't stay here." Then, with some frustration, the old gentleman said, "What will I do?" and the Devil said, "You will have to go back to Tewksbury."

The situation which confronted that little company was that the National Labor Relations Board would not take jurisdiction, and the State administrative authorities and courts could not take jurisdiction. That is what we have referred to as no man's land. The situation was left dangling in the air, without a remedy against those who were causing the difficulty in the business.

The substitute contains a provision to the effect that the Labor Board may relinquish jurisdiction if it so decides, for the very reason that commerce has not been substantially burdened. But on the other hand, if the Board does not assume jurisdiction, it will not prevent the State courts and the State administrative bodies from asserting and assuming jurisdiction.

I believe that the essential difference between the substitute and the pending bill, Senate 1555, lies in the fact that under the pending Kennedy-Ervin bill the Board could permit States to assume jurisdiction, but only with respect to administrative agencies, and not the courts of the State. Actually the administrative agencies would become agents of the Board for the purpose of applying the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Did the committee ascertain how many States have agencies which could function in that field? Are there any?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think there are 12.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Twelve out of fifty States?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. So there are still some 38 States which could not obtain any relief at all under the pending bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct; and that is the reason why this substitute provides that a case may go to any agency or any court of any State or Territory.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What is the Board required to do? What affirmative action is the Board required to take, so that we may know when jurisdiction goes to the States, and when the Board retains jurisdiction?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the Board declines jurisdiction, the substitute provides that nothing in the law shall prevent any agency or any court in the State from assuming jurisdiction.

Mr. McCLELLAN. When a client seeks counsel from his attorney, how is the attorney to know whether the Board will accept or decline jurisdiction?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Board can either make a specific finding in a specific case, or it can make a rule, above which it will assume jurisdiction, and below which it will not assume jurisdiction.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The determination is still left dangling. The amendment does not require the Board to act.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We leave it within the discretion of the Board.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is what is wrong now. The Board can now take jurisdiction or not take jurisdiction, according to its discretion; and, in effect, we have a no man's land, in which there are grievous wrongs and no remedy under American jurisprudence as of this time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I can only answer that by saying that if we try to apply a very rigid rule it will probably offer more difficulty than preserving the latitude which this language provides. The language of the substitute provides that the Board, in its discretion, may, by rule or otherwise, decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute. So a legal representative would certainly be advised; and I think some latitude and flexibility is far more desirable than trying to apply an inflexible rule.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Let us assume that a labor dispute has just arisen. A client goes to his attorney and inquires about it. The attorney says, "I do not know whether the Board will assert jurisdiction or not. We will submit the case to the Board, and let the Board decide whether to take jurisdiction or not." Is that correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does not the Senator think it would be better practice to require the Board to prescribe a rule containing criteria for the determination of the question as to whether or not it will take jurisdiction, so that every case would not have to come before it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the answer is that the number of cases involved in which commerce is not actually burdened is so great that we might just as well leave the decision to the discretion of the Board, rather than to draw a line and say, "This is the dividing line."

Mr. McCLELLAN. The amendment is vague. A board with experience which this Board has had over the years the law has been in effect should be able to draw a line and say, "Beyond this line we are not going to take jurisdiction. We will leave it to the States."

I have an amendment which I shall propose if some other disposition is not made of the question. My amendment would require the Board to do exactly what I have described. Then, if there were doubt as to whether the Board would decline jurisdicition, by a general rule or by a specific rule, so that people might know in advance, a case could be submitted, and within 30 days the Board would have to pass upon it. Why cannot the Board make a rule at least defining a great area of these cases, so that everyone who has a grievance, or who has been wronged, will not have to go to the National Labor Relations Board in order to determine where his rights are and how to proceed?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I can see that point of view. This difficulty is easily cured, because if we say that the Board shall make a rule, instead of using the language of the substitute, which provides that the Board may make a rule, I think that meets the objection advanced by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. I still am inclined toward the flexible side, because I believe the workload upon the Board today is such that the Board will issue a rule in due course to meet the volume of work with which it is confronted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I suggest that the Board could lighten its workload to a great degree by making one rule to give guidance, instead of making a rule in every case that comes before it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Chairman of the Board was before us, and we heard a great deal of testimony. I was disposed to go along with the flexible proposal, rather than to write the word "shall" into the law.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to vote for this amendment if I could not obtain approval of my own amendment, which I think is preferable. But I am in the position of considering this provision along with several other provisions, and I am not sure that I can vote for it. I think the substitute is a great deal better than what is in the bill. What is in the bill does absolutely nothing, and only confounds and confuses that which is more complex than man can understand.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I share the feeling of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. I thought this provision was far preferable.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I can confirm what the Senator from Illinois has stated. The language of the substitute seems to me to be a great improvement over what is in the bill.

I am inclined to the view of the Senator from Arkansas. I should like to see criteria established, and as many cases as possible settled by rule of law rather than by rule of men. Perhaps we cannot do it at this time, but I would prefer to see the law a little more specific, and not have so much discretion in the Board, primarily because of the workload the Board carries.

I believe the Senator will tell us as he goes along the differences between his amendment and title VI, which was just approved. Am I correct in saying that, with the exception of the section dealing with supervisors, everything contained in title VI is contained in the Senator's substitute, and that, in addition, he has made a few other proposed corrections?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator is correct.

If Senators will bear with me, I am watching the clock. A group of witnesses are waiting in the committee room in the New Senate Office Building, and I promised to be there and hear them at half past 3. That is the reason why I tried to skeletonize these remarks.

As soon as the distinguished Senator from Arizona returns he will amplify every one of the items in the substitute now pending. If the distinguished Senator will bear with me until I dispose of the out-of-town witnesses, I should like to allude to the other items in the substitute.

Mr. MUNDT. A plea for brevity on the part of any Senator is so rare that I am delighted to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am very grateful to the Senator.

The first item deals with a vacancy in the office of General Counsel.

The second item in the substitute deals with the so-called no man's land cases.

The third item deals with the secondary boycott. We could be here for a long time discussing that subject. The boycott provision has been very carefully drawn. It is complete. I think it is adequately safeguarded. It has the approval of the Secretary of Labor. It represents the administration's viewpoint; and I think it is infinitely preferable to the inadequate provision carried in Senate bill 1555.

The fourth item deals with so-called recognition, organizational, or blackmail picketing. It is set forth on the bottom of page 61 of the substitute, S. 748. I believe it all properly set forth here. I believe all the safeguards are there. In addition, it is a picketing proposal with some teeth. I believe the great interest of the people of the country, over and above any other situation or proposal we could make with respect to the bill, relates to so-called organizational picketing.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, does this section also have the approval of the Secretary of Labor and the administration?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is the administration's bill and the administration's proposal.

The next part deals with prehiring agreements. I remember that 2 years ago, when Mr. Richard Gray, the head of the Carpenters Union, came to the reception room with the General Counsel of the Department of Labor, they presented to us a proposal on the so-called prehiring agreements in the construction industry.

They said, "This is what we want." I talked to them myself. I believe other Senators did likewise. What is carried in the substitute follows literally what we had agreed upon 2 years ago. Our proposal is superior to what is in the Kennedy bill, in the sense that there are safeguards contained in our proposal with respect to the prehiring agreements in the construction industry.

The first of these safeguards, of course, provides that there can be no strike to force employees. There has to be some bargaining history behind any kind of agreement such as that. It is not possible to subject a small number of employees to the pressures which are involved here. It carries out pretty well the understanding we had 2 years ago. With these safeguards, it is, in my judgment, far preferable to what has been reported by the committee.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The safeguards to which the Senator refers are safeguards for the employees? Is that correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. For the employees; yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the Senator forbear for a moment? I shall be happy to yield to him later.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Certainly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The next item deals with so-called economic strikers. This is the proposal which was sent to Congress by the administration 2 years ago. It received its impetus from the situation which developed in the O'Sullivan Heel Co. case in Winchester, Va. The strikers in that plant were replaced one by one by management. As a result, under the Taft-Hartley Act, they lost their right to vote in a bargaining or representation election.

My proposal would safeguard the right of workers to strike. Therefore the proposal is called the economic strikers' amendment. I offered this amendment on the floor of the Senate when the labor bill was before the Senate last year. There is a comparable proposal in the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

With the exception of the provision on page 65, dealing with elections befor hearings, where there is no substantial issue involved, these are the items in the substitute: First, to make provision for filling a vacancy in the office of the general counsel of NLRB, and to provide that the President can do that; second, to deal adequately with no man's land cases; third, to deal effectively with secondary boycotts; fourth, to deal with organizational picketing; fifth, to deal with so-called prehiring agreements in the construction industry, with further safeguards.

In substance and in essence that is the substitute which is presented to the Senate today.

Most of the items I have mentioned have had considerable attention in committee and have been discussed at length back and forth. Therefore I commend the substitute in place of title VI now contained in the Kennedy bill. Title VI in the pending bill, in my humble and considered judgment, is inadequate to the purposes for which it was designed.

Mr. McCLELLAN and Mr. LAUSCHE addressed the Chair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall yield first to the Senator from Arkansas, and then to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have only one question. I believe the Senator has spoken of five or six items.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Actually, there are six items. One is of a minor character.

Mr. McCLELLAN. One is of a minor character, but altogether there are six items involved here.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am inclined, in principle, to support some of the proposals advocated by the Senator from Illinois. However, certainly it would be easier for me to make up my mind and give favorable consideration to some of the proposals, and actually support some of the provisions, if they were submitted separately? When they are all put into one bundle, it is a different matter entirely. The Senator has said that the committee has given study to these matters. Some of us have not had the time or the opportunity to go into these points. The Senator may be satisfied. Nevertheless, it is very difficult to legislate in this important field by taking a whole package of proposals at one time. Some of them I would support in principle and would probably vote for. However, to know exactly what we are doing, I would appreciate it very much—and I know the Senator would get better consideration—if he could offer the amendments one at a time, and permit us to vote them up or down on the merits as each amendment is considered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to answer my distinguished friend from Arkansas in this way: I realize that there is a single-package approach and that there is a two-package approach to the bill. The theory of the Ervin amendment in connection with title VI was to strike out title VI and most of the references to the Taft-Hartley Act, in the hope that subsequently the Senate would consider another labor bill dealing essentially with amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. Of course, all of that is conditioned on certain imponderables. First there would have to be a bill dealing with the items which engross our attention as amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. Second, hearings would have to be held by a subcommittee. Third, the matter would have to go to the full committee. Fourth, a bill would have to be reported to the Senate for the calendar. Fifth, it would be necessary to get an order before the bill could be considered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The longer I serve in the Senate the deeper my conviction becomes as to the unpredictability of the legislative future. There can be no assurance from my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] that there will be a bill and that there will be hearings held by the subcommittee. There can be no assurance that a bill will be reported by the subcommittee to the full committee. There can be no assurance that it will be reported by the full committee. There can be no assurance that, if the bill were placed on the Senate Calendar, it would be possible to get an order for its consideration. Therefore any objection on the call of the calendar would stop the bill. I prefer, in the month of April 1959, when half the session is already over, to have an opportunity to vote on and to present the administration's viewpoint on secondary boycotts, on picketing, and on the other items which are presently covered by the substitute. I am not insensible of the fact that pinpointed amendments can sometimes get better attention than amendments put into one package, as we have in the substitute.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I understand the situation. I know it is possible to offer amendments. The only thing I was saying was that I thought we could give better consideration to the amendments, if the Senator is sincere in wanting them adopted, if he were to present them one at a time on their merits, instead of lumping them together in one package. I do not know whether I could vote for all of them; but, I know that I could vote for some parts of the Senator's proposals if they were separated and I had the opportunity to pick out what is good in my judgment and eliminate the other parts.

The Senator said that the committee has studied these matters. The committee has studied the subject sufficiently to report title VI.

I see no reason why there should be the delay the Senator fears. We could go back to the committee and in 30 minutes return with title VI and could vote it up or down. There is no necessity at all for delay. I am sure that if the two leaders agreed, it could be done, and no one could stop it. It is as simple at that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must respectfully submit one modification of the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas. When he says the committee reported the bill, essentially that is correct. But the junior Senator from Illinois, who is on the committee, did not vote to report the bill; he voted "no" on that question. That is the reason why he is offering a substitute which he believes is far more adequate to solve the problems which confront the country today in the labor field.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in my understanding that last year the administration in its bill recommended provisions which would deal, first, with blackmail picketing; second, with secondary boycotting; and third, with prehiring arrangements in the building and construction industry?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; either last year or the year before, or even the year before that, because it is necessary to go back and pick up the stitches to ascertain all the recommendations which the President has made to Congress from time to time—to get the whole package of recommendations which were made in every one of those fields.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Are the recommendations made by the President and the Secretary of Labor contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; title V, S. 748. It has been called the administration bill. It was the other major bill in addition to S. 505, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. It was later, however, that we had before us the bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

I may say, simply to make certain that the record is complete, that the bill proposed by the Senator from Arkansas was introduced after the subcommittee hearings were over. We recognized that we were running into an impasse. So I think it was generally agreed in the subcommittee that, first at last, we might just as well act in the full commitee to consider these amendments.

I thought the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], who has done such a capital job as chairman of the Rackets Investigating Committee, was entitled to be heard, even though the hearings had been closed. So one afternoon he had abundant opportunity to present his case. This was true also of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] and the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

So at long last, before the committee concluded its deliberations on the bill, all those Senators had the opportunity to present the matters which they wanted to have considered in connection with the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in understanding that the bill recommended by the committee rejected the administration's request for a law to deal with blackmail picketing, and secondary boycotts, but that it accepted the President's recommendation on prehiring agreements in the building crafts work, though it diluted that recommendation by eliminating from it the proviso that a union and a contractor might enter into a collective bargaining agreement without the consent of the workers, provided there had been a previous history between the contractor and the union, and provided also that if the workers believed that the union was not representing them, the workers had the right to appeal to the Labor Board?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The distinguished Senator from Ohio is so apt in choosing the right word. When he said those proposals in the pending bill were diluted, he was quite right. I think in a word that expresses the whole business pretty well.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In my opinion, the three recommendations made by the President were vital. The first, prohibiting blackmail picketing, and the second, prohibiting secondary boycotts, were rejected outright. The third recommendation of importance, dealing with prehiring agreements, was accepted, but was diluted to the point where the protection of the liberty of the worker was completely eliminated by the abrogation of the proviso that only when there is a previous history between the union and the contractor may the pre-hiring agreement be made.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The distinguished Senator from Ohio presents the case pretty well.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think he presents it very well. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I desire to yield the floor and to return to the wars later, as soon as I have concluded with the witnesses at a hearing concerning two judgeships for the State of Illinois.

SUSPENSION OF ATMOSPHERIC NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, on the basis of a memorandum circulated by the U.S.S.R. group at the spring council meeting of the Interparliamentary Union at Nice, France, the week after Easter, Premier Khrushchev should accept the proposal made by President Eisenhower to take a "first step" on the suspension of nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere.

As one of the delegates named by the Senate, it was my privilege to attend the council meeting of the Interparliamentary Union.

I have in my hand a memorandum which was circulated by the Soviet group at the committee meeting on the reduction of armaments. In the memorandum, the Soviet Union asserted its desire for a radical solution of the disarmament problem, but maintained that their efforts to reach a comprehensive agreement have invariably come up against a barrier of reservations and objections on the part of the United States, British, and other governments which are parties to military coalitions, such as NATO, SEATO, or the Baghdad Pact. After making that statement, the U.S.S.R. memorandum says:

> Under those circumstances, the way out of the situation would be to solve the disarmament problem gradually, step by step, beginning with the more pressing issues.

Having said that, and having proposed a step-by-step solution, taking up the most pressing issue first, the Soviet memorandum then went on to discuss the cessation of atomic and hydrogen weapons tests as the most important initial step.

In their presentation in this 9-page memorandum, the U.S.S.R. reflected either a misunderstanding or a misinterpretation of the United States-United Kingdom position. It seemed for a time that this statement had a certain propaganda effect, for the representatives of some of the smaller countries were impressed, perhaps, by the claim of the U.S.S.R. memorandum that we were imposing demands concerning control over the implementation which, in effect, would be a system of espionage. The language of the memorandum is that the United States and Britain are also putting forward such demands concerning control over the implementation of a treaty on the discontinuance of tests as are clearly unacceptable to the Soviet Union.

Here is the sentence in which the U.S.S.R. completely misrepresented the position of the United States and the United Kingdom:

> The Western Powers want detection posts to be staffed exclusively with foreign personnel. They want to bring about a situation in which the control committee to which these posts are to be subordinated can be a mechanical majority of votes cast by Western representatives—a virtual veto—impose decisions affecting the security of the Soviet Union. To meet those claims would mean for the Soviet Union to agree to the establishment on its soil of a full-fledged intelligence network of the Western Powers.

Mr. President, that was so clearly a misstatement of the United Kingdom-United States position that I undertook to answer it in detail. At the committee meeting with me was Dr. Walter Stoessel, Jr., of the U.S. Embassy in Paris. I asked Dr. Stoessel to give me a memorandum which provided our precise position with respect to the control posts; and I quoted in detail from it, to show that actually the United States and the United Kingdom have not asked that the detection posts be staffed exclusively with foreign personnel, but, on the contrary, that the proposal called for a control team of three parts. One part would be composed of technicians and supervisors who would be from the two countries of the three nuclear powers that did not include the country that was under inspection or under control—that is to say, in the U.S.S.R., the first one-third of the supervisory technicians would be composed of nationals of the United States and the United Kingdom. If, on the other hand, the control posts were in the United Kingdom, then the first one-third would be composed of nationals of the United States and the U.S.S.R.; and if the control team were in the United States, the first one-third of the control team would be supplied by the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R.

The second one-third in each case would be an international group not representative of any of the three nuclear powers, but, rather, composed of representatives selected by the countries which were without nuclear capability.

The final one-third of the control teams would be composed of nationals of the host country. They would be the service personnel; and in that case it was thought by the United States and by the United Kingdom's representatives at Geneva satisfactory to use nationals of the host country which was under inspection.

So I tried to make clear that that was the actual position of the United Kingdom and the United States; namely, that we wanted the detection posts to be staffed exclusively with foreign personnel—and not as stated by the U.S.S.R. The latter interpretation was not the correct one. On the contrary, I pointed out that the system of inspection proposed by the U.S.S.R. would have amounted to self-inspection—inspection by teams composed of nationals of the country under inspection, so to speak. Obviously, that would not be satisfactory and would not be a guarantee of proper control. I think I made the point sufficiently clear, because my argument on that point was not rebutted by the Russian delegate or by the Polish delegate who spoke subsequently.

The second misrepresentation or source of confusion as a result of the Soviet memorandum at that Interparliamentary Union meeting was created by the Soviet memorandum statement that—

> The Western Powers insist on suspending nuclear weapon tests only for 1 year. The suspension of tests for so brief a period is needed for a study of the results of the explosions already carried out and for the preparation of a new series of tests. That is why the Soviet Government considers the Western Powers' proposal for the suspension of nuclear tests for 1 year unacceptable.

I had to point out, Mr. President, that there, again, was a misunderstanding or misinterpretation of the position of the United States and the United Kingdom. The Soviets were trying to make capital of their claim that they wanted to put an end forever to nuclear tests. I reminded them that at the outset of their memorandum they had said the way out of the situation would be to solve the disarmament problem gradually, step by step. So I pointed out that in proposing a 1-year suspension, we were taking that logical, step-by-step approach; and that in proposing the suspension for 1 year, it was as a means of getting something started. I also pointed out that that was not intended to provide a period for study of the results of the explosions and for the preparation of a new series of tests, but, rather, that it was in order that we might see whether or not effective controls were actually provided.

Again, it was in order to refer to some documentary material. The Interparliamentary Union maintains a permanently staffed Bureau, which had prepared, for the consideration of the delegates to the Council meeting, a résumé by the Interparliamentary Union's Bureau, there was a quotation from the August 22 statement of the British and American Governments in terms of the United Kingdom's note that we would—> be prepared to refrain from nuclear tests for successive periods of 1 year, provided satisfactory progress was made toward the installation of effective systems of international control.

So, again, we sought to clear away the confusion which had been created by the Soviet memorandum, and to make clear that what the United States and the United Kingdom were seeking to accomplish was a step-by-step suspension of nuclear tests, and a step-by-step approach to the entire problem of reduction of armaments.

I have reason to believe that that effort met with favorable results. The comment on my remarks at the committee meeting that afternoon was commendatory. We met in a subcommittee session that evening, and drafted a resolution which, on the following morning, was unanimously adopted for referral back to the Council, and, in turn, to the conference of the Interparliamentary Union which is to be held at Warsaw next September. The draft of that resolution was based upon a revision of one submitted by the British group and another one submitted by the Polish group.

At this time, I wish to read the draft resolution which is to be submitted by the drafting committee to the committee on reduction of armaments. It reads as follows:

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION, NICE, MARCH 31 TO APRIL 5, 1959—GENERAL AND REGIONAL MEASURES WHICH COULD CONTRIBUTE TOWARD A SOLUTION OF THE DISARMAMENT PROBLEM

The 48th Interparliamentary Conference,

Conscious of the urgent need to put a halt to the armaments race and motivated by a sincere desire to preserve world peace and work together to achieve comprehensive disarmament by progressive stages;

Considering the disastrous economic, social, and political consequences of the armaments race and the urgent need therefore to pursue the objective of comprehensive disarmament through the prohibition of international agreements of the manufacture and use of all nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, and the gradual reduction of Armed Forces and conventional armaments;

Recognizing that such an agreement must ultimately depend on the willingness of all nations to accept a fully effective system of international inspection and control,

Urges that efforts to reach a general disarmament agreement be continued;

Calls for acceleration in the progress already achieved to this end during the negotiations at Geneva for a treaty to end nuclear weapons tests under proper control;

Notes with approval the agreement recently expressed by the heads of the Soviet and United Kingdom Governments that, in conjunction with necessary progress toward a satisfactory overall political settlement, further study could usefully be made of the possibilities of increasing security by some method of limitation of forces and weapons, both conventional and nuclear, in an agreed area of Europe;

Expresses satisfaction at the prospect of early discussion and negotiation on these vital questions at the Foreign Ministers' level, later to be followed by a meeting of the heads of governments.

That is section A of the draft resolution as it was worked out by the drafting committee of the Subcommittee on Reduction of Armaments at the council meeting in Nice from March 31 to April 5, 1959.

There was also a section B, to which I shall invite special attention. Before doing so, however, I wish to say a few words of comment about section A. In the paragraph referring to progress on overall political settlements, it was my suggestion that the word "necessary" be inserted before the word "progress." That suggestion met with favor by the several delegates, and was agreed to. I suggested the word "necessary" in order that the resolution might be consistent with the position the United States was taking—that there should be some necessary progress at the foreign ministers level before a meeting was held by the heads of government.

I am pleased to say that the delegates at the IPU council meeting agreed to the inclusion of the word "necessary" before the word "progress," so the implication would be that there would have to be necessary progress at the preliminary meetings before the summit meetings of the heads of government.

Part B of the resolution as submitted to the council for further reference to the conference deals with the beneficial use of outer space for peaceful purposes. The American delegation to the Nice council took with it a draft of a resolution prepared by staff members of the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences. The draft as presented was somewhat longer than was appropriate to the format of the draft resolutions being used by the IPU, but the draft committee adopted the major purpose and major provision of the resolution which we took from the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences. It reads as follows:

The 48th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Recognizing that the new dimension of outer space can be used for peaceful purposes for the benefit of all mankind or for military weapons more destructive than any man has ever known,

Conscious that the first space activities developed under the aegis of the International Geophysical Year are an outstanding example of international cooperation among the scientists of 66 nations,

Urges that national groups of the Inter-Parliamentary Union should direct efforts within their parliaments conducive to the settlement of international problems of outer space in the context of general disarmament and the development of potential outer space benefits for humanity.

The acceptance by the drafting committee of this resolution, which was the proposal of the U.S. group, is a noteworthy step forward, it seems to me. At the time the atomic bomb and the hydrogen bomb were first developed, if the nations could have agreed that the use of nuclear materials would be devoted to the benefit of humanity for constructive purposes, the history of the past several years might have been somewhat different.

I personally suggest that the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States should not lose sight of the fact that the IPU meeting in Warsaw in September will be considering this resolution, which was proposed by the U.S. group and which provides that the potential outer space benefits be developed for humanity, and that the first space activities developed under the aegis of the International Geophysical Year be regarded as an outstanding example of international cooperation, and thereby provide a suggestion as to how we might proceed in considering the problems which will arise.

In concluding my remarks before the armaments committee, I pointed out that our proposals were definitely in keeping with the Soviet statement that the way to proceed or to progress was to solve a problem gradually, step by step, beginning with the more pressing issues.

So today I would say to Premier Khrushchev that President Eisenhower's letter of April 13 is in harmony with the idea of a step-by-step approach. On that basis, the Premier should accept the proposal made in the President's letter.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to compliment the Senator from South Dakota on his statement, and also to compliment him and the members of the committee who recently conferred in Nice and who probably will confer at the Interparliamentary Union meeting to be held in Warsaw this year.

I wish to call the attention of my colleagues in the Senate to the fact that here lies one of the greatest potential organizations—one in which the United States has participated for many years—for the solution, not only of worldwide problems in connection with peace, but of many problems which daily beset us in that area.

I hope every Member of the Senate will read the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota, and particularly the recommendation made by our delegates at Nice.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I deeply appreciate the kind remarks of the Senator from Colorado.

SMALL COMPANIES ENGAGED IN STEEL PRODUCTION

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, it was with great interest that I read, in the March 20 edition of the American Metal Market, that nearly half the companies engaged in the steel industry are comparatively small businesses. The table of figures accompanying this thorough article gives an excellent picture of our American steel industry, and depicts the surprisingly large part played by smaller firms.

Too often we are led to believe that the steel industry is a field for giants only. There is no doubt of the tremendous importance of the large steel firms in shaping the course of our economic stream. But it should not be overlooked that 40 percent of the companies which comprise the steel industry are actually companies having less than 100,000 tons annual ingot capacity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that portions of a highly informative article by Freeman Bishop be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SMALL FIRMS HAVE BIG PLACE IN STEEL COMPANY RANKING

NEW YORK, March 19.—Steel, popularly regarded as an industry of giants, is actually composed 40 percent of companies having each less than 100,000 tons annual ingot capacity. Another 35 percent of the companies have between 100,000 and 1 million tons of yearly capacity, while 20 companies, or less than 25 percent of the 82 ingot producers, have each in excess of 1 million tons annual capacity.

These significant facts are revealed today in the American Metal Market's annual ranking of steel producers according to size of their tonnages. The table appears on page 12.

SMALL BUSINESS

In addition to the 82 companies whose ingot capacities are reported by the American Iron and Steel Institute, about 180 steel companies are nonintegrated—produce no steel in molten form but buy semifinished forms, such as billets, skelp, wire rods or hot rolled strip in coils, to run down into finished products. Most of these 180 also would rank as small business. If these 180 are added to the 33 small producers (less than 100,000 tons each) it becomes evident that three-quarters of the total of about 260 steel companies in the United States would be classified as small.

THREE NEW PRODUCERS

Of the 33 small ingot producers, 13 are new since World War II while three are new ingot producers within the past year. Some of the oldest and best known tool and specialty steel companies are included in the ranks of these small tonnage producers. In sales dollars they would probably rank higher.

Although these 33 companies, many of which do not produce in a year the equivalent steel tonnage contained in one ordinary office building, make up 40 percent of the number of ingot producers, their aggregate capacity is a shade less than 1 percent of the industry's total. What they lack in avoirdupois is counterbalanced by the strategic importance of their specialties, which occupy an important place in the American economy. It is significant that they have a high rate of survival.

Nearly all of the companies in the 33 group are equipped with electric furnaces only. Quite a few of them are located away from large steel centers.

MIDDLE HAS VARIETY

The middle group of 29 companies, 35.4 percent of the ingot producers by number, accounts for 7.9 percent of total steel capacity. Running all the way from a trifle over 100,000 tons annual capacity to just a little short of 1 million, these companies are of a great variety in the nature of equipment and products. Four of them are integrated, being producers of pig iron as well as steel, though the characteristic of the group is semi-integration, with a mixture of open hearth, and electric furnaces. Some of the best-known names in alloy steel are in this group, although a number also are primarily producers of carbon steel.

DANGERS OF INFLATION—WORK OF SENATOR KEFAUVER AND SUBCOMMITTEE ON ANTITRUST AND MONOPOLY

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, for almost 2 years the able and courageous senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] has carried on a one-man campaign as chairman of the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary to inform and alert the Nation to the danger of inflation and the steady rise in the cost of living.

Not only freshman Members of Congress, but all of us, can profit by the splendid example set by the patient, intelligent, searching investigation conducted by the Senator from Tennessee in this complex economic field.

As a member of the Antimonopoly Subcommittee, I heartily endorse the comments of Milton Britten on this subject. Mr. Britten's keen understanding and penetrating analysis should be read by all of us.

As in the Dixon-Yates case, the determination and devotion of the Senator from Tennessee scores again in the public interest. The people of Tennessee must be proud of such an illustrious son.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the very excellent article written by Milton Britten.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS IN DIXON-YATES CASE, KEFAUVER BEGINS TO WIN FRIENDS ON STEEL ISSUE

(By Milton Britten)

WASHINGTON.—Senator ESTES KEFAUVER could write a good "How To —" book for freshmen Members of Congress on a subject that offers real challenge.

The subject: "How to get public support on an issue so murky and complex that it has no apparent popular appeal."

From personal experience KEFAUVER could include in this book a chapter on how, once you've got some public support, you can even get your opponents on your side.

He did it most notably in the Dixon-Yates case, a knotty, involved contract between the Government and a utilities combine to introduce private power into the TVA area.

Before he got through probing this contract the term "Dixon-Yates" was a Republican liability and the contract was repudiated by the very administration that made it.

He seems about to do it again. A Kefauver campaign that started 2 years ago as little more than a whisper will head toward a roaring climax here April 22.

That's when labor and management leaders of the steel industry will be among witnesses testifying before Kefauver's Antimonopoly Subcommittee on a pending bill that would require big industry to give prior notice of price increases.

But it's inevitable that KEFAUVER and his colleagues will grill steel's management-labor chiefs about what KEFAUVER, almost singlehandedly, built into a national issue—the inflationary dangers of a steel price boost.

KEFAUVER got started on his campaign in July 1957, right after the steel companies announced a $6 a ton price boost. When he opened his "administered price" hearings, few except economists knew what administered prices were, let alone their impact on the economy.

There was plenty of elbowroom at the press table as administered prices were identified for the record as those established by the managers of big, concentrated industries, like steel, rather than by laws of supply and demand in the marketplace.

KEFAUVER called in the Nation's top economists, labor and management representatives of the steel and auto industries. He seldom got a big press out of the hearings. The vast majority of his Republican Senate colleagues greeted his inquiries with a hush. The ranking Republican committeeman, Senator EVERETT DIRKSEN of Illinois was consistently critical.

DAILY SPEECH IN SENATE

Last summer, with the threat of another steel price boost KEFAUVER really turned the heat on. From June 13 to July 1, rumored date of the price increase, he spoke daily in the Senate of the threat to the American consumer of a steel price boost. The price of everything from bobby pins to baby buggies would go up, he warned.

He wired and wrote the President three times, urging Ike to call a White House conference of labor-management leaders in steel and use his influence to hold the wage-price line in this key industry. Ike declined. But KEFAUVER was gaining support from a number of Democratic Senators for his fight. And the press began carrying more extensive reports on the problem.

The steel industry, ignoring Ike's plea for labor-management statemanship, soon thereafter increased prices $4.50 a ton. KEFAUVER, noting that this would cost direct buyers of steel $285 million and the ultimate consumers many times that amount, called new hearings.

GETS COLD SHOULDERS, BUT—

With the coming of the new Congress he proposed that the industry hold the price line. Labor, he proposed, should gear any wage increase demands to increases in productivity. Management ignored the suggestion, Dave MacDonald, the steelworkers' chief, told him to mind his own business.

KEFAUVER retorted this was the public's business. The press coverage was substantial. President Eisenhower in his last news conference warned the industry that its forthcoming negotiations must be handled "in such a way that the price is not compelled to go up."

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, a member of KEFAUVER'S subcommittee, made a floor speech taking KEFAUVER'S tack that "if the consumer pays the increase, it is part of his business." His remarks were broadcast in a press release by the Republican Policy Committee, suggesting that KEFAUVER now is to get substantial support from the other side of the aisle.

The industry's 3-year contract with the steelworkers ends in June. The industry has credited past price boosts with increased wage demands, which the union disputes. The outcome of new negotiations is now of lively bipartisan concern.

KEFAUVER'S formula of lots of digging, patience and persistence, has focused wide public attention on administered prices in steel and the danger of an increase. It's likely that there'll be less elbowroom at the press tables April 22 than there was when ESTES first started his inquiry 2 years ago.

ADDRESS BY CHESTER BOWLES—WILL FOREIGN POLICY BE DECISIVE IN 1960?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McCARTHY. Last week the Minnesota Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party held its annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner. We were privileged to have as our principal speaker the distinguished Member of Congress from Connecticut, the Honorable CHESTER BOWLES.

Representative BOWLES, our former Ambassador to India, spoke of the great need for a creative foreign policy.

I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by him be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILL FOREIGN POLICY BE DECISIVE IN 1960?

(Speech by Hon. CHESTER BOWLES, of Connecticut, at Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner, Minnesota Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party, Minneapolis, Minn., April 18, 1959)

Governor Freeman, Senator Humphrey, Senator McCarthy, my fellow Democrats of Minnesota, ladies and gentlemen: Every spring about this time we Democrats pause to pay homage to Jefferson and Jackson.

And where is our great liberal tradition more vigorously reflected in belief and action than on the home ground of the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota?

Where else in the country today can you find such a rich mine of dedicated enthusiasm, intellectual vigor, political success, and solid meaningful accomplishment as your wonderful Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party has produced in Hubert Humphrey, Eugene McCarthy, and Orville Freeman?

Such an abundance of talents is rarely bestowed on a single political party in a single generation in a single American State. You Minnesotans are thrice blessed, and so is the country, because of you.

Whatever happens and whoever wins in 1960, there are few qualified observers who would not agree on one thing: What this country needs most is not a good 5-cent cigar, nor even a good $10 golf lesson, but a new creativeness in the conduct of our affairs both at home and abroad.

I suppose from the earliest days of our political history successive generations have soberly described the coming national election as the most important ever held. This time, I am deeply convinced, we can say it and prove it.

Consider how our world has been turned upside down in the last 14 years.

In the background, casting a pall over all that we say and do, is the danger of a nuclear war. Technology presses relentlessly toward the development and dispersal of new weapons of terror, with the danger of miscalculation and accident increasing day by day.

To intensify the world's state of nerves, new brink-of-war crises erupt with each season of the year—Suez and Quemoy, Lebanon and now Berlin.

In the meantime, a billion and a half people in Asia, Africa, and Latin America are striving impatiently to create new societies or to reaffirm old ones.

Their task has been made all the more complex by new technical developments in agriculture, public health, engineering, and communications which have created new hopes and expectations in remote villages everywhere on earth, and created them far faster than they can be satisfied.

Thus the contrast continues to grow between the rich, prosperous Western nations and the world's three underdeveloped continents where 70 percent of mankind now live. The explosiveness of this contrast is underscored by the fact that the richer

West is largely white and the poorer Asians, Africans, and Latin Americans are largely colored.

Thrusting powerfully toward the center of the world stage is the Soviet Union with an economy that is now expanding nearly three times as fast as ours and with more than double our output of technical and professional men.

Certainly no generation of Americans ever faced a challenge of such sweep and magnitude.

Yet most of us are hardly aware of its dimensions, let alone of its implications. Indeed, the Eisenhower administration often acts as if the challenge itself would quietly go away if only we could learn to be more patient.

The result has been a massive negativism in foreign affairs which has positioned us in situation after situation as grim-faced supporters of the status quo. Thus the initiative today lies in the Kremlin.

CAN DEMOCRATS MEASURE UP?

What about us Democrats? Can we as a party lay honest claim to greater sense of direction? Do the American people understand what our position is?

As we Democrats look toward the election in 1960, we see much to bolster our political confidence. Many of us have been persuaded that continuing unemployment, low farm income, high interest rates, lack of administration concern for schools and housing, will in themselves assure the election of a Democratic President.

But in all honesty and with all personal respect, I must challenge the view of those who believe we can afford as a party to ignore the continued dangerous drift in world affairs.

If the present situation persists, I believe that there is an odds-on chance that the Democrats will again organize the Congress in January 1961. But I also believe that we may inaugurate another Republican President on the Capitol steps.

As I see it, the election in 1960 of another Democratic Congress and another Republican President would be disastrous. It would mean four and probably eight more years of divided government, and that is not the way our American Government is supposed to work.

I have the highest personal regard and admiration for the Democratic leaders of the present Congress who have conducted themselves so ably and responsibly under the most trying of circumstances. But we simply cannot afford, for another Presidential term, a continuation of our present hyphenated national responsibility with the inevitable political buck-passing which flows from it.

With even the most competent and patriotic leadership, a government so completely checked and so tightly balanced will continue to find it difficult if not impossible to provide the sharp, clear, and bold policies that are now required of us.

FOREIGN POLICY ISSUE

Let me explain why I believe our continued failure as a party to think through the fundamental questions involving America's relations with the world may cost us the White House in 1960.

Basically I think that the American people look on the election of a Congress and a President in quite different ways. When we cast our vote for a Senator or a Congressman it is usually the questions that most directly affect social security, wages, prices, employment, and profits which presumably carry the greatest weight.

When we choose a President to direct American policy in this troubled, difficult world, it is quite another matter.

Indeed, in four of the last five presidential elections, foreign policy has played a dominant role.

This role may not have been fully reflected in the campaign oratory. But deep in the subconscious and unspoken attitudes of the voters, I believe that it was the overriding issue of war and peace that largely determined their selection.

Let us look briefly at the record:

In 1940 F.D.R. faced the handicap of the anti-third term tradition. His opponent was far and away the most appealing candidate that the Republican Party had nominated since 1916. Had 1940 been a normal election year, there was an excellent chance that Roosevelt would have lost and Willkie would have won.

Instead, in the spring of 1940, the eyes of American voters were suddenly focused upon the Nazi conquest of France and the imminent threat to Britain. The need for continued, vigorous, experienced American leadership to preserve freedom in the world became obvious, and the voters acted accordingly.

The election of 1944 was again dominated by President Roosevelt's wartime leadership and his imaginative initiative for peace.

In 1948, such domestic issues as high prices, lack of housing and farm problems were the overriding issues in President Truman's sensational reelection bid.

But few would deny, least of all Mr. Truman, himself, that his election received an important assist from his remarkable foreign policy achievements: the Truman doctrine, the Marshall Plan, and the formulation of NATO.

In 1952, an appealing Republican newcomer to the political scene was in a position to capitalize on his experience in a wide variety of foreign assignments. The Eisenhower foreign policy image proved to be an effective one, especially when bolstered by spurious public relations appeals such as "I shall go to Korea" and "the Democrats get us into wars; the Republicans get us out of them."

In 1956, President Eisenhower was presented as the patient negotiator at the Geneva summit meeting, the sturdy wartime leader whose energies were now devoted to peace. This image appeared so formidable that many Democrats more or less surrendered the foreign policy arguments to the Republicans without challenge.

PEOPLE DOUBLY WORRIED NOW

Today, the dangers of the cold war impasse are even more in people's minds than they were then. Thus I believe that a decisive number of American voters in 1960 will again support the candidate who, according to their informed or intuitive judgment, best understands what must be done to prevent a nuclear catastrophe.

I am convinced, therefore, that unless the Democratic Party not only picks the right candidate but affirmatively identifies itself with a more positive and creative approach to world problems, we will fail once again to elect a President.

In spite of the outspoken and imaginative foreign policy proposals of such individuals as Bill Fulbright, Adlai Stevenson, Hubert Humphrey, Jack Kennedy, Mike Mansfield, Stuart Symington, and a few others, I sense a deep public uneasiness over the absence of an identifiable, predictable, realistic Democratic Party approach to the major issues of foreign affairs.

If I am correct, and if we cannot reverse the situation, this uneasiness may decisively undercut the efforts of our Presidential candidate no matter how personally qualified on foreign affairs he himself may be.

Of course I will be reminded by many of my Democratic colleagues that only the executive branch of our Government can create and conduct foreign policy. That is true.

Yet rightly or wrongly, the voters are going to expect from us in the opposition party much clearer signals in the foreign policy field than we are now giving them.

FOREIGN POLICY IS COMPLEX

Why is it that over the last 6 years we Democrats have made disturbingly little progress in developing a constructive and reasonably cohesive party position in foreign affairs?

I believe that there are a variety of reasons. Let me suggest a few:

1. Many of our party managers remain convinced that most people are not interested in anything but the bread and butter issues of their daily lives.

They may be right when they say that this explains the election of Democratic Congresses in the last three congressional elections. But Presidential ballots are almost certain to be marked on broader grounds.

2. There is the natural fear of dividing our party ranks on intricate foreign policy questions. We all know that there are differences of opinion inside the Democratic Party and that recognition of these differences tends to neutralize our internal foreign policy discussions.

3. There are practical difficulties in responsibly fulfilling the role of a loyal opposition on foreign policy matters without undermining an administration which must make the final decisions.

Thus, when no particular crisis has been at hand, most Democrats have been inclined to take the line of least resistance and leave foreign policy questions to the administration, the editorial writers, and the TV and radio commentators.

4. Many Democratic Party spokesmen, inside and outside public office, have become deeply aware of the complexity of foreign policy, and this inclines them to shy away from it.

Thus, when the Quemoy crisis hit the headlines, many Democratic Congressmen felt instinctively that the administration's position was at best weak and at worst dangerously wrong.

When they said so, they were castigated as appeasers ready to run away from Communists under fire. When they switched uncertainly to support the administration's policy, they were challenged with equal vigor by others who demanded: "Then this means that you are ready to invite a nuclear war over two rocky islands off the China coast that no one has ever heard of?"

This persuaded many Democrats that the safest issues were the homespun ones such as highways, housing, and social security. Here, at least, they felt themselves to be on safe and familiar political ground.

5. Recently, the very stagnation of our economy has impelled many Democrats in Washington to wonder if we may not have to sacrifice doing the right things abroad because the administration will not let us do the right things at home.

CONGRESSIONAL DEMOCRATS FRUSTRATED

Threatened Presidential vetoes of the very legislation on which many of us were elected last fall—extended unemployment benefits, school and hospital construction, area redevelopment, urban renewal, higher farm income, small business legislation, and all the rest—leads to congressional frustration and uncertainty.

Thus many Democrats in Congress are tempted to take out on the foreign-aid program their pent-up disappointments over domestic legislation. The result is an unbecoming flirtation with isolationism which is beginning to affect some of the ablest and most respected leaders in our party.

Last month the Democratic-controlled House Appropriations Committee voted to kill essential economic development abroad. Right now many observers believe we will be lucky to get a clear Democratic majority in Congress for an adequate mutual security bill.

Our frustrations are both human and understandable. But their political implications, I submit, are serious.

We are faced with the belief of many Democrats that the easiest course is to leave the perplexing problems of foreign policy to the Republicans until we are back in power. If we as a party pursue this inclination much further, it may keep us from returning to power.

Our predicament becomes even clearer when we realize that the two most likely Republican Presidential candidates have already established themselves as men of considerable interest and vision in foreign policy. Both, obviously, recognize its political importance and intend to make it the primary basis for their appeal in 1960.

In July Mr. NIXON will be off to Moscow. Will Mr. Rockefeller be far behind?

Thus, the election of a Democratic President in 1960 may hinge on our ability between now and our convention in July 1960 to create a more positive and persuasive image of our party's approach to foreign policy. As we move to meet this challenge, we have two major advantages.

TWO DEMOCRATIC ADVANTAGES

First, on the great world issues of the day, I believe that 80 percent of our party, nearly 100 percent of the independent floating vote, and even a substantial percentage of Republicans are now ready to respond to imaginative foreign policy leadership.

Second, in the creation of foreign policy, the Democratic Party has the unique advantage of an incomparable liberal heritage which is readily understandable throughout the world.

The impact which the Democratic Party stamped on the history of the last century and a half has grown from its role as a party of the people.

In our years of greatness we have been true to that image, and the people of America and the people of the world have responded.

Jefferson never forgot that his own strength, and the only possible foundation for his country's lasting strength, lay with and among the people.

He knew that for a time the people might be fooled and misled. He knew that political lapses and detours were inevitable. But he had supreme faith in the ability of people to affect their own destiny.

His election in 1800 meant that democracy was henceforth to be the basis of American life. His opponents failed to understand this at the time, and that was the chief measure of difference between them and him.

Jefferson clearly recognized this difference. "Men are naturally divided into two parties," he said. "One, those who fear and distrust the people, and wish to draw all powers from them into the hands of the higher classes. Two, those who identify themselves with the people, have confidence in them, cherish and consider them as the most honest and safe depositary of the public interest."

It was the Democratic Party, concluded Jefferson, that was to stand for equal rights for all and special privileges for none.

Consider the burning concern for the interests of the people contained in Jackson's veto message on the U.S. bank bill:

"When laws make the rich richer * * * the humbler members of society—the farmers, mechanics, and laborers who have neither the time nor the means of securing like favors to themselves—have the right to complain of the injustice of their Government."

Jacksonian Democracy made certain that the "humbler members of society" would always find their home in the Democratic Party as long as that party remained true to its traditions.

For generations, these homely but powerful sentiments have remained the chief measure of difference between America's two great parties. And today that difference has become of supreme importance in the relative ability of the two parties to formulate and conduct American foreign policy.

"All eyes are opening to the rights of man," Jefferson asserted 2 weeks before his death. "The light of science has already laid open to every view the palpable truth that the mass of mankind have not been born with saddles on their backs, nor a favored few booted and spurred, ready to ride them."

"The American Revolution," he added, "was intended for all mankind."

Much of the world is now swept up in this revolution. The Burmese delegate to the U.N. put the Jeffersonian proposition quite precisely in a speech in New York earlier this month.

"The West likes to think and speak of the Atlantic community as the heart of the free world," he said, "but to most of the earth's population it seems less the free world than just the rich world. What is more disturbing from the point of view of the West is that all the current trends show it becoming a smaller and smaller minority getting relatively richer and richer.

"The prosperous Atlantic countries today are in a position resembling that of the aristocrats of Europe at the close of the 18th century," the Burmese delegate continued. "They had served a useful purpose, but new and powerful classes were swelling up below them.

"Some aristocrats, like the French, met the challenge head on, and perished. Some, like the British, found they had much in common with their rivals and so survived, first as leaders and later as equal partners."

WHERE WE NOW STAND

Now let us look at the world in this perspective.

At this midpoint in the 20th century, America, the oldest practicing democracy in the world, has become an aristocrat among nations. Our enormous comparative wealth has increasingly separated us from mankind and now threatens to blind us to the hopes and objectives of more than half the human race.

Can we reasonably expect a Republican administration—even if it were led by a genuine liberal such as Nelson Rockefeller—to reverse this situation?

Republican politicians have never really understood the aspirations, fears, and frustrations of the people of Detroit, Pittsburgh, or Minneapolis. How, then, can they be expected to understand those of the people who live in New Delhi, Tokyo, or Accra?

How can Republican planners, satisfied with our present slow-paced progress, appreciate the explosive impatience of Asian, African, and Latin American leaders attempting to ride a revolutionary wave?

How can a Republican administration, which seeks to hamstring TVA and which cannot find room in its budget for adequate unemployment compensation, schools, housing, and city planning, come to grips with the urgent development problems of the underdeveloped world?

How can the ideological descendants of those who denounced Jefferson and Jackson as radicals in their lifetimes, reach out with sympathy and understanding to the new leaders of Asia, Africa, and Latin America who know that the enduring liberal principles of Jefferson and Jackson are now the only alternatives to communism?

It is this total lack of orientation, this failure to understand that people and ideas are the primary forces that shape history, which explains the administration's blind negativism in East Asia, its lack of understanding of the importance of South Asia, its utter failure in the Middle East, its confusion in Africa and Latin America, and its wavering course of action in Europe.

The Republican Party as it now exists is an unlikely instrument for the task of forging the worldwide democratic counterrevolution which is so urgently needed.

What then about us Democrats?

What approach can we support as a party that will enable America to move out of its present defensive and negative rut?

Expressed in political terms, how can we give the voters a sense of confidence and trust in our capacity to lead America and the world responsibly and imaginatively toward peace?

Clearly our role is not simply one of opposition. We must not be drawn into reckless criticism.

But neither should we continue to be pressured or wooed into an ineffective me-too-ism.

As Senator FULBRIGHT recently said: "Bipartisanship, in theory an instrument of national unity, has in practice often been used as a gag on legitimate discussion. * * *

"Time and time again," he continued, "we have found ourselves in situations where the administration, after carefully consulting itself, has announced a policy. Whereupon the cry goes out that right or wrong it cannot be debated, since this would show the world that we are divided."

In 1950 Senator Vandenberg himself said: "Every foreign policy question must be totally debated * * * and the loyal opposition has a special obligation to see that this occurs."

When the administration is wrong, we Democrats should say so, and offer sober, realistic alternatives. When the administration is right, we should offer our support generously and wholeheartedly.

RESPECT FOR PEOPLE

Our built-in advantage as Democrats lies, as we have seen, in our greater understanding of and respect for people as individuals, wherever they may be, and regardless of their race, their creed, or their color.

Our liberal heritage gives us not only the necessary framework but provides us with a sense of direction. It also gives us an effective yardstick with which to measure day-to-day policies against long-term global objectives.

Those objectives must be clearly, unequivocally and persuasively stated and restated: A world at peace, with increasing national self-determination, economic growth, and social dignity for all men everywhere.

Every thoughtful man knows that the present peace by terror cannot last indefinitely. If there is to be a real peace, we must find the means to break loose from the sterile and infinitely dangerous impasse into which the cold war has forced us.

Unhappily, however, the cold war will not disappear for the asking. It was created by Soviet pressures for world domination. It can be eased only as these pressures are eased and diverted.

What kinds of policies from us are most likely to help accomplish this result?

WHAT WE CAN DO

As long as the Soviet Union refuses to negotiate a disarmament agreement with meaningful safeguards, a powerful American military apparatus is essential. Indeed, it may be necessary further to bolster our defenses if we are to convince the Soviet Union that it cannot win the arms race.

But we must recognize military power for what it is: An essential barrier to direct Communist aggression. For the long haul the most important question is what we do or fail to do behind that barrier.

In order to achieve its objective of world dominance, the Kremlin must first split the 600 million skilled, highly industrialized part of the West. This means separating America from Europe.

The most direct approach to this objective is a frontal threat to European security, relying in the last analysis on Soviet military might. We now see this tactic at work again in the Berlin crisis.

But there is a second Soviet tactic which the administration has failed adequately to take into account.

Lenin once said that the road to Paris lies through Peiping and Calcutta. He believed that if communism could secure control of even an important fraction of the Asian and African raw materials on which heavily industrialized Europe depends, America could be isolated and eventually brought to terms.

Khrushchev is now pursuing both of these tactics simultaneously with great skill and determination and with a steadily increasing supply of capital and technicians for export to the underdeveloped continents.

In dealing with this challenge, our historic Democratic Party dedication to human dignity—our concern for man—can provide us with a useful guide to action.

It will warn us, for instance, against trading the status quo in Berlin for the status quo in Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia. If such a deal is presented to us in the coming months as an "American diplomatic victory," let us recognize it for what it is—no more or no less than an expedient, naked sellout of the 120 million people of Eastern Europe.

It will lead us to insist on more sensitive and better trained representatives in our far-flung foreign operation—representatives who will spend more time in the villages and less on the diplomatic cocktail circuit.

It will cause us to press for information programs that reflect the true America, with both its strength and imperfections which we are struggling to correct—instead of the synthetic, unreal, perfectionized image we have so often arrogantly presented to the world.

It will lead us to suggest an expanded and improved economic aid program; not to buy allies or even solely to stop communism, but because we believe in man's right to live and prosper under governments of his own choosing; that is all men, not simply Europeans and Americans.

It will enable us to see the critical importance of an adequate military defense to protect our freedom and to insist that we get that defense. But it will never allow us to forget that our enduring objective is to help create societies worthy of freedom.

It will encourage us to persevere in any negotiations with the Soviet Union at any level that offers the slightest hope for a relaxation of the arms race, but to insist hardheadedly on effective inspection safeguards.

It will lead us to place a higher value on person-to-person contacts in all parts of the world, because we know that individual Americans are best able to explain to others what America is all about and thereby to give the lie to Communist propaganda.

It will make us forego arrogant, patronizing talk of America as a self-appointed leader of the free world, because we know that in a truly free world leadership cannot be imposed or bought, and that our efforts to assume it create resentment.

It will encourage us to look on our agricultural plenty as one of America's greatest assets, and to propose imaginative new techniques that will enable us to distribute a major part of it each year to an undernourished world, not to purchase subservience, but in the interests of peace and brotherhood.

It will serve to remind us that we, ourselves, were born in revolution and that those who now seek to discard colonial rule, ready or unready for self-government as they may be, are walking in our footsteps.

It will underscore the fact that in our strivings for national security, democratic America seeks not satellites but partners.

HOPE FOR PEACE

I deeply believe that out of such convictions and actions, rooted as they are in an understanding and respect for our fellowmen, a revitalized Democratic Party can create a new basis for America's relations with mankind.

I believe that we can bring America into direct, creative communication with the great movements which are sweeping Asia, Africa, and Latin America; movements that are impatient of the past, eager for the future, opposed to any ideology which denies the dignity of man; yet confused, frustrated, and looking for political shortcuts.

Many Democratic leaders are already speaking out as Jefferson and Jackson would have us do, and none more earnestly, more thoughtfully, or more persuasively than your own HUBERT HUMPHREY.

But others hold back, wondering about our proper tactics, uncertain of our real objectives and hopeful that administration errors and valid domestic political appeals will suffice to pull our party through.

I emphasize that these other appeals are valid. In nothing I have said do I mean to imply that the broad domestic issues with which our party is identified should in any way be subordinated or neglected.

I am merely insisting that alone they are not enough, and that to rely on them exclusively for a Democratic White House victory in 1960, is wishful thinking.

May I add that it is also profoundly unworthy of the party of Jefferson and Jackson.

America's progress from decade to decade has never been reflected by a steadily rising curve. Rather it has come in a series of bold forward surges interspersed by periods of apathy, inaction, and breath catching.

Invariably when the time has come to move forward again, it has been Democratic Party leaders from Jefferson to Truman who have caught the vision, set the goals, blown the bugles, and led the charge.

In the 1930's the Democratic Party, under Franklin Roosevelt, carried America to a new peak of greatness. In dealing with the threat to postwar Europe, we responded again.

Since 1953 a Republican administration at a great crisis point in history has been content to protect past gains and to preserve wherever it can a status quo which most of mankind no longer considers adequate.

Now we Democrats face our historically familiar responsibility: To reassess America's objectives in the framework of a new challenge, and to refocus our liberal traditions on a world that offers infinitely greater possibilities than anything our fathers knew.

Jefferson believed that the American Revolution was intended for all mankind. Let us hope that in January 1961 a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress will have earned the opportunity to prove that he was right.

REPLY TO ATTACKS ON MICHIGAN

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], recently addressed the Women's National Democratic Club. The subject of his address was the falsity of the attack that has been waged against the State of Michigan.

This speech summarized the myths that have arisen about the present economic and political climate in Michigan, and presented a systematic, documented reply to each of these distorted charges. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's remarks be printed in the RECORD.

NOTES FROM REMARKS BY SENATOR PHILIP A. HART, OF MICHIGAN, AT MICHIGAN-WISCONSIN LUNCHEON, WOMEN'S NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CLUB, WASHINGTON, D.C., APRIL 16, 1959

The following are some of the myths and facts about political exchanges in the State of Michigan that have attracted nationwide attention.

Senator PHILIP A. HART said in presenting this summation: "Let no one mistake this for another chapter in an old debate about who hit what.

"The truth is that all of the people of Michigan hope that this book is now ended. My comments today have the sole purpose of pointing up what efforts designed to achieve short-term political advantage can do to the long-term political interests of a State.

"Here are some myths about Michigan that have been made prominent, and some independent evaluation of the facts:

"The myth (from the U.S. News & World Report article 'A Welfare State Runs Into Trouble,' Feb. 13, 1959): 'All these problems have combined to add to the State's financial worries. New business enterprises are slow to come to Michigan.'

"The fact (Ann Arbor News, Mar. 5, 1959): 'Consumers Power Co. said it will spend $117,800,000 this year as part of a $575 million gas and electric service expansion program over the next 5 years.

" 'Other expansion projects of Ford Motor Co. and Michigan Consolidated Gas Co. call for the expenditure of $69 million this year. Also announced was an expansion program in the Muskegon area by Brunswick-Balke-Collender which will add 600 workers.

" 'Ford is going to spend $35 million improving its steel manufacturing plant in Dearborn. The program is expected to extend into 1962.'

"The myth (U.S. News & World Report, February 13, 1959): One reason frequently cited by some businessmen for this decline in jobs is that the State has an unfavorable climate for attracting and holding private business and industry. All through the State government, businessmen say, they run into an attitude of hostility."

"The fact (Detroit Times, March 23, 1959): If Michigan has lost its dynamic aggressiveness—if Michigan's economic glories are all of the past and none lie ahead, someone should tell the big three of the automobile world which has invested in excess of $3½ billion in Michigan facilities since 1950."

"The myth (from the Republican National Committee publication Battleline, an article entitled 'The Welfare State Hits Bottom,' March 4, 1959, picks up much of the same material used in the U.S. News & World Report article): 'With the the political backing and guidance of Walter Reuther, Williams has jumped the State's overall annual spending from about $500 million to over $1 billion. And budget balancing has been scrapped in favor of more and more deficit spending.

" 'The result of these disastrous economic policies, which some Democrats would adopt for the Federal Government, has been fiscal catastrophe. Michigan, one of the wealthiest of States, has a State government which is stone cold broke.'

"The fact: Commenting on this charge which first appeared in the U.S. News & World Report article, the Detroit Times, March 22, 1959, said:

" 'Then look a few pages farther back in the same issue of the same publication.

" 'Without reference to Michigan it discloses that State spending—for all States—now totals more than five times as much as it did in 1946.

" 'And it says: "Put your finger anywhere on a map of the United States, and odds are that you'll find a State in serious financial difficulty'."

"The myth (Senator DIRKSEN, April 8, 1959, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD): "I am advised, Mr. President, that the favorite beverage nowadays in some of the better emporiums in Michigan is a delightful little concoction known as Michigan on the rocks."

"The fact: The most recent comparative figures for State spending and debt have just been released by the U.S. Department of Commerce. This report shows that Mr. DIRKSEN's State ranks 13th highest in the Nation and that Michigan follows behind after 10 other States (24th). It shows further that Illinois, like nearly half the other States, is considerably above the national average with a net long-term per capita debt of $277.09, while Michigan's per capita average is only $220.24. The national average for the States is $274.45.

"The myth (Chicago Tribune, February 25, 1959): "He (Williams) wants a personal income tax, a corporation tax, a tax on financial institutions and an increase in the State's constitutional debt limit."

"The fact: Robert P. Briggs, executive vice president of the Michigan Consumers Power Co. (Jackson, Mich., Citizen-Patriot, April 4, 1959) had this to say about the present tax system:

" 'He said that * * * he was shocked at how regressive the present tax structure is.

" 'Persons with income between $2,000 and $3,000 pay 12 cents State and local tax on the dollar * * * while those in the $7,000 to $12,000 bracket pay 6 cents on the dollar.

" 'A sales tax would only magnify this problem.'

"The myth: Secretary of the Interior, Fred Seaton, at Gettysburg, Pa., on April 3, 1959, said:

" 'What has really happened in Michigan is that for to long the present was allowed to cannibalize the future.'

"The fact (Detroit Times, March 23, 1959): 'Michigan's population is growing faster than any other State's except California and Florida * * * Michigan contributes more of its tax revenues to higher education than any other State in the Union, a point that must appeal to new settlers in the State.'

"The myth: Senator BARRY GOLDWATER in a Lincoln Day speech at Saginaw, Mich., on February 9, 1959, said:

" 'What is wrong with this State is not economic, it is political. * * *

" 'It is because the Democrat Party in your State is a shell—merely a label—taken over by a special interest. That special interest is the United Automobile Workers. And I am not referring to the rank-and-file union members. I am referirng to a few politically ambitious union leaders, men with a Socialist background. * * *

" 'His is the hidden hand behind the policies in the State of Michigan which have brought this great industrial State to its knees, on the verge of bankruptcy.

" 'The stranglehold of the labor politicians on the State of Michigan is a well-known fact to businessmen across the country.'

"The fact ('The Commentator,' an article by W. K. Kelsey in the Detroit News, February 11, 1959): 'Everybody familiar with the history of Michigan during the past decade knows that the hidden hand of Mr. Reuther and the stranglehold of the labor politicians have not controlled six Republican legislatures, which with the connivance of stupid voters, have brought Michigan to its present condition of silly impotence.

" 'Williams was first elected Governor in 1948. At the same time the people chose a legislature whose senate consisted of 9 Democrats and 23 Republicans, and whose house stood 39 Democrats to 61 Republicans.

" 'The tale was repeated in 1950, except that the Democratic Governor had the backing of only 7 Democrats in the senate and 34 in the house. Again in 1952 the Democrats had little to say; they gained one senator but no representatives.

" 'Is anyone silly enough to believe that in those 6 years, when both houses were firmly held by the Republicans, Governor Williams and Walter Reuther had their way with the legislature? If they did, theirs was one of the most remarkable conjuring tricks in all history.'

"The myth (Battle Line, Republican National Committee, March 4, 1959, 'The Welfare State Hits Bottom'): 'Any American confused over who is right—the President or his free-spending critics—can resolve the issue by studying Michigan which has been run the past 10 years by Gov. G. Mennen Williams as a sort of model ADA–UAW State.'

"The fact: Commenting on the fact that the No. 1 indictment of Michigan is that it is a welfare state, the Detroit Times, March 22, 1959, assembled these interesting facts of what is being spent by State and local governments in various States for institutional and noninstitutional aid for the needy:

" 'Welfare costs each Michigan citizen $16.30.

" 'It costs each Ohio citizen $17.71.

" 'In Arkansas—where some businessmen dream of finding respite from the welfare state, it was $19.17. * * *

" 'In California—where they are so shocked over Michigan's plight—the welfare costs for each citizen is $29.19.

" 'And in Oklahoma it is $47.73.'

"The myth: Again, in the Saginaw Lincoln Day speech by Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, February 9, 1959:

" 'We have seen that the Michigan predicament is very real and that there is a widespread conviction in the rest of the country that Michigan is no longer a good place in which to expand or to enter with a new manufacturing business.'

"The fact: The U.S. Department of Commerce, September 1958, in a brochure entitled 'Area Development Bulletin' measures variations in industrial growth by States on the basis of value added by manufacture, 1947–56.

"The average value added in all States was 88 percent.

"Value added in Michigan was 106 percent. Only one other northern industrial State was higher than Michigan, and that was Ohio, with 108 percent.

"The myth (Fred A. Seaton, Secretary of Interior, Gettysburg, April 3, 1959): 'In Michigan, a political force under a professedly liberal banner has for a decade avoided the hard realities of the management of the State's finances and relied heavily on deficit financing. As a result, the Governor of Michigan is presently known far and wide as a dealer in deficits.'

"The fact: 33 days after assuming office, the Governor of Michigan sent to the Republican-controlled legislature on February 2, 1949, a tax message calling for tax levies to close the gap between expenditures and revenues.

"It is a fact that over the period of Governor Williams' incumbency, the Republican legislature has appropriated 99 percent of the requested expenditures by the Governor, but it has failed to heed his continuing call to close the revenue gap in tax messages of March 15, 1950; March 9, 1951; January 10, 1952; February 10, 1953; January 27, 1955; February 7, 1956; February 22, 1957; and January 21, 1958."

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, one of the most repeated charges that has been leveled at Michigan in recent months is that the present State administration, allegedly under the sinister hand of some labor leaders, has turned Michigan into a so-called welfare state. It may well be that there are such States in this Nation. I would assume that one could classify such States on the basis of what they spend for government.

I now ask unanimous consent that the table to which I now refer be inserted at the conclusion of my remarks. It is a table prepared by the Congressional Quarterly, from figures gathered by the Census Bureau, and was printed in the April 19, 1959, issue of the Washington Post and Times Herald. The table sets forth what the several States and the District of Columbia spend, per capita, for government.

I hope that all of my colleagues will read this table with the same interest as I did. A careful reading might serve, at least, to give some pause to those who have attacked Michigan as a welfare state.

They might note, as I did, that Michigan stands 15th among the States in per capita governmental expenditure. They might note that Arizona stands 12th, for instance, and I am sure that no electer representative of the people of Arizona would care to have his State characterized as a welfare state. The same holds true for the elected officials of the other 13 States which stand ahead of Michigan in per capita governmental expenditure.

If the per capita State expenditure for all government is not conclusive evidence as to what kind of government is now enjoyed in Michigan, let me cite the rank of Michigan in per capita expenditure for public welfare. This figure, perhaps better than any other, should indicate which States can be classified as welfare states.

The table indicates that Michigan stands 34th in the Nation. Again, I am sure that the Representatives of Arizona, which stands 23d, would not want to be classified as Representatives of a welfare state, nor would the Representatives of the 32 other States which outrank Michigan.

Mr. President, it is time that these truths about Michigan replaced the lies and slanders that irresponsible persons have cast against my State.

One newspaper that has done a remarkable job in setting forth the truth is the Detroit Times, which recently published a series of articles entitled "The Real Truth About Michigan."

I commend these articles to all of my colleagues who have found themselves wittingly or unwittingly repeating these falsehoods. All the articles can be found in recent issues of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Detroit Times, however, has continued its public service to the people of Michigan by summarizing the articles in a full-page advertisement.

This advertisement appeared in Monday's New York Times, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table and articles presented by Senator MCNAMARA were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

What the States spend per capita

In our awesome contemplation of the $77 billion Federal budget, we are likely to overlook the fact that State and local governments now cost more than $50 billion a year. The above chart showing State spending on a per capita basis was prepared by Congressional Quarterly from Census Bureau figures for the fiscal year 1957, ending June 30, 1957, the latest full-year figures available. It shows, for instance, that Nevada spent the most per citizen ($367) and Arkansas the least ($147); that California spent the most for schools ($98 per capita) and Arkansas the least ($39); that Connecticut spent the most for highways ($106) and South Carolina the least ($25); that Oklahoma spent the most for such public welfare as aid to the poor and blind ($46) and Virginia the least ($6); that New York spent the most for hospitals and other health services ($32) and South Dakota the least ($8).

THE REAL TRUTH ABOUT MICHIGAN

First, let us say this.

We are very, very fond of the State of Michigan. The entire State. Its forests. Its lakes. Its rivers. Its wildlife. Its farmlands. Its industry. Its people.

When we hear too many negative comments about it—and, in recent months, there have been plenty—we figure that those who are making them either don't know what they're talking about or that they have an ax to grind.

Don't misunderstand us.

There are definitely negative things that can be said about the State, but, of late, there has been a rash of completely negative comments. And, in our book, all bad is as erroneous as all good.

With this in mind, we called together six of our writers on the Detroit Times and asked them to report the real truth about Michigan, as they saw it. We asked them to report on labor, industry, the tax structure, research, every facet of Michigan life that has been given a negative image lately.

Here is what they said:

WELFARE STATE?—UNFAIR TAXES?

John Creecy started the series of articles by zeroing in on two of the most prominent anti-Michigan allegations. Regarding the welfare state accusation, Creecy pointed out that—if this meant public welfare: institutional and noninstitutional aid to the needy:

"A new U.S. census report shows what this cost—in terms of both State and local taxes—for each Michigan citizen * * * and for the citizens of every other State.

"Welfare cost each Michigan citizen $16.30.

"It cost each Ohio citizen $17.71.

"It cost each Arkansas citizen $19.17.

"In California * * * the welfare cost for each citizen is $29.19.

"And in Oklahoma it is $47.73. * * *

"Among all the States Michigan ranked 34th in this respect."

Regarding the tax structure, Creecy again compared Michigan to other States. He reported that the average California citizen pays $237.87 in State and local levies, according to the latest census study.

"In New York the average citizen pays $229.31.

"In Wisconsin * * * it's $184.47.

"Michigan? It's $181.13 per citizen. We rank 12th among the States in this regard. When taxes are considered as a percentage of personal means we rank 31st."

INDUSTRIAL WITHDRAWAL?

James Boynton, Detroit Times financial editor, found that nothing could be further from the truth. As examples of current investment by industry, he singled out such examples:

"Ann Arbor: Where Parke Davis & Co. and the Bendix Aviation Corp. are building multimillion-dollar research laboratories. And where Hoover Ball & Bearing Co. and Buhr Machine Co. have just completed big new plants.

"Ecorse: Where the Great Lakes Steel Division of National Steel Corp. will spend $100 million constructing a new mill.

"Kalamazoo: Where the Upjohn Co. has commenced a $12 million expansion program, including what probably will be the biggest office building in the State outside Detroit. Also where the Checker Cab Manufacturing Co. is investing $5 million in capital costs in connection with production of its new passenger car.

"Grand Rapids: Where the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co., Lear, Inc., and Blanding Paper Products are expanding to take advantage of being in the midst of the Great Lakes market.

"Muskegon: Where Brunswick-Balke-Collender is pouring several millions of dollars into a brand new pin-setter manufacturing plant.

"Detroit: Where Detroit Edison is embarked on a $3 billion 5-year expansion program, with $68 million to be spent this year; Michigan Bell Telephone Co. is expanding at the rate of $75 million a year; Michigan Consolidated Gas Co. recently announced it would spend $30 million in addition to another $20 million for its new office building in the civic center; Consumers Power Co. this year will make the largest capital expenditures in its territory—$117½ million; General Telephone Co. is spending $12.8 million on 1959 expansion."

REUTHERISM?

Jack Crellin, Detroit Times labor editor, quoted UAW President Walter P. Reuther as saying employers who claim they are moving out of Michigan to escape high wage rates are whistling in the dark.

"The small guy," said Reuther, "might be able to hide out for a while in a corner of Arkansas, but eventually his plant is going to be organized and he is going to have to pay a living wage. * * *

"Ford plants," continued Reuther, "pay the same rate for the same work regardless of where they are located in this country. The differential between General Motors plants is only a matter of pennies."

DOES REUTHER CONTROL GOVERNOR WILLIAMS?

"Nothing could be more ludicrous," said Reuther.

"I actually see him only three or four times a year and then on a public platform. I have never sought to influence him and he has never sought my advice.

"I think if anyone can control a person in public office he isn't worthy of holding the office. If I thought I could control 'Soapy' Williams I would be opposed to him."

AUTOMOTIVE MIGRATION?

Tom Kleene, Detroit Times automotive editor, reported that "most of the qualifications that made Michigan the center of automotive production in the industry's infancy remain.

"Added to these are many new ones, and the greatest is the all-important fact that the industry now is here. A mass flight would be about as practical for the automotive industry as moving the entire Government structure and its buildings out of Washington, D.C. * * *

"Actually the process of decentralization is almost as old as the industry itself. * * * Henry Ford realized the advantage of locating an assembly plant near the consumer soon after his company went into mass production. The result was that at one time in the early 1920's the Ford Motor Co. had nearly twice as many assembly plants as it now has. * * *

"Chrysler Corp. states that * * * in considering specific sites, it looks for an area capable of supplying the plant personnel of the type needed within a 30-mile radius.

"Next comes consideration of such things as zoning ordinances, land costs, type of soil, accessibility to railroads and trunk highways, availability of water, sanitary, and drainage systems, electricity and gas, and terrain which will not require costly grading.

"Chrysler reports that when a plant is lured into a community by such inducements as free land the result, in most cases, is not a happy situation either for the community or for the company concerned."

Kleene pointed out that for new capital expenditures for the industry's greatest 3-year expansion boom (prepared for 1954, 1955, and 1956, by the Bureau of the Census): "Of a total investment of $3,272 million * * * $1,282 million was spent in Michigan, or almost 40 percent of the total."

He concluded: "Actually, the present spreading out of the automobile industry from the focal point of Detroit reflects the optimism of the manufacturers over the future market which—indirectly at least—makes this area's insurance policy all the more secure."

LACK OF PROGRESS?

Will Hardy, Detroit Times economics writer, reminded readers that "oft forgotten is the precept that American communities are built around their transportation systems.

"When water transport was the only means of mass movement of materials, our Nation's first great cities were port cities.

"In the late 1800's and early 1900's, railroads spurred the growth of inland cities.

"Then came the automotive revolution, and highways brought new growth to hitherto remote areas and added to the transportation complex of the cities.

"Detroit and Michigan, ahead in automobiles, jumped ahead of the Nation in highways.

"Now, with the air age blending into the space age, Detroit has soared ahead with dramatic development of the Detroit Metropolitan Airport, the jewel of the Nation's newest and foremost landing fields, for jet-powered transport planes."

He further pointed out that "meanwhile in roads, Michigan is making a fantastic investment to keep cars and trucks moving freely. * * * When the current highway construction is completed in 1962 * * * 900 miles of expressways will connect all Michigan cities with population of more than 50,000 and will provide through routes interconnecting 95 percent of the State's population and 90 percent of the industries."

RESEARCH?

Jack Pickering, Detroit Times science writer, reported that the University of Michigan ranks third in the United States, exceeded only by Massachusetts Institute of Technology and California, in defense projects being handled for the Government. And the automobile industry has spent many hundreds of millions for research centers in Detroit and Michigan.

IN SUMMARY

John Creecy concluded the series of Times articles with an overall report on the industrial climate of Michigan. He quotes William Haber, noted professor of economics at the University of Michigan, as saying:

"Assuming high levels of employment nationally one can be decidedly optimistic about Michigan's economic outlook. * * *

"Population growth by itself does not generate jobs. It provides, however, a sound basis for economic growth. * * *

"There is no exodus of industry out of Michigan. There are more manufacturing plants operating in the State than there were in 1949 or 1953.

"And even the automobile companies, while they are now building elsewhere, have made substantial investments and expansion in their Detroit and other Michigan facilities in the postwar period.

"We are in an industrial redevelopment program. The resources promise its success once we pursue it with the vigor which has made Michigan a great industrial State."

As Creecy points out, industry in Michigan has spent $110 million for expansion, a jump of nearly $30 million from the 1957 figure. The total outranked every State except Texas, New Jersey, and Illinois. Thus, Michigan ranked fourth in industrial construction in 1958.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his suggestion a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARTHY in the chair). Does the Senator withhold his request?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I withhold my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I am in a quandary about the pending amendment. It is long. It is technical. It is frightfully involved. It is difficult to read, let alone understand. I listened to the able senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] earlier this afternoon, who said that he believed some parts of the amendment would improve the bill while other parts of it would not. Thus the Senator suggested that different segments of the pending amendment ought to be offered separately. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas. I think the several parts should be offered separately, so that we can pass judgment on them separately and vote on them separately. That is in the interest of good procedure.

I am prepared, Mr. President, after a reading of the text of the pending substitute amendment to support unequivocally some of the sections of the amendment. With respect to other sections, I desire to ask some questions. Possibly I shall offer language which in my judgment would improve the sections about which I have some question.

Therefore, I should like to make my position crystal clear. I feel compelled, Mr. President, to vote against the substitute amendment in its present "package" form. Having said that, I wish to iterate a part of what I hope will be presented to me tomorrow in a form which I can approve by my vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to the able Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is the Senator aware of the fact that if the amendment were agreed to it would mean that all amendments dealing with secondary boycotts, prehiring agreements, picketing, and so forth, would be in the third degree; and that it would be impossible for any Member of the Senate to offer any amendment dealing with any of those subjects if the substitute amendment were agreed to in its present form?

Mr. KUCHEL. I am not aware of that. Is that the parliamentary situation?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is the parliamentary situation. If the substitute amendment of the Senator from Illinois were agreed to, it would then become impossible to deal with any of these subjects, which involve the most sensitive and delicate areas of labor relations.

Mr. KUCHEL. So that there may be no misunderstanding, Mr. President, since my able friend from Massachusetts has raised a very important question, will the Chair officially state what the parliamentary situation would be, in view of what the able Senator has suggested?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from California that if the amendment were agreed to as a substitute for title VI, the action would be binding upon the Senate, and specific provisions of the amendment could be reached only indirectly; so the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts is essentially correct.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Do I correctly understand that if the substitute amendment were agreed to it would then not be open to any further amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The language per se would not be open to amendment.

Mr. KEATING. A further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEATING. The only way by which an amendment to the pending substitute amendment could be considered would be by offering such an amendment prior to action on the Dirksen amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is essentially correct.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEATING. If an amendment to the Dirksen amendment were to be offered, since the yeas and nays have been ordered on the Dirksen amendment, could the yeas and nays be ordered on an amendment to the Dirksen amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate agrees, the yeas and nays can be ordered on any amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield to my friend, the able Senator from South Dakota for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from California has raised the possibility of adopting portions of the so-called Dirksen substitute amendment. Is it not correct to state that that could be done by any Senator's offering portions of the amendment, if he so desired, as perfecting amendments to the original text of the bill, to be voted upon before the substitute amendment is voted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Title VI is open to perfecting amendments now.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes. And title VI could be perfected prior to a vote on the Dirksen substitute amendment, which is essentially a motion to strike and to insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. If the Dirksen substitute amendment for title VI were agreed to, then there would be difficulty in offering amendments.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Dirksen amendment itself could not be later amended, once it had been agreed to, but it would be possible for an amendment to be offered as a perfecting amendment to the main bill. It would be possible also for an amendment to be offered to the Dirksen amendment, which would put it in both places.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order to amend the Dirksen amendment now by perfecting amendments.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes. While the Dirksen amendment is pending, perfecting amendments could be offered to the original bill before the Senate. In fact, the Dirksen substitute amendment could be offered piecemeal until it was all incorporated in the text of the original bill, prior to the vote on the Dirksen amendment, if that were so desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only with respect to title VI.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; as to title VI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I was waiting for the Senator from California to conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I am not alone in the questions which occur to me with respect to the substitute "package" amendment. On some parts of the amendment it is relatively easy to reach a conclusion. One provision of the substitute amendment, for example, simply states:

> In case of a vacancy in the office of the General Counsel the President shall designate the officer or employee who shall serve as General Counsel during such vacancy.

That is easy to vote up or down. I am for that. It seems to me no Member of the Senate should have any question about it.

However, then the proposal becomes a little more difficult. Then we come to the provision dealing with the "no man's land," which is a complex State-Federal jurisdictional question. It may be that the language in the bill on that subject is effective. It may be that the Members of the committee who heard the subject discussed will give us the benefit of their views pro and con, so that those of us who are not Members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will have the opportunity to make a decision. I hope this may be the case.

Then we come to the most involved questions of all, those which deal with such problems as so-called organizational picketing. Let there be no mistake. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, we need legislation in this field. If the employees in a given business determine that they do not want to belong to a union, I think the public interest clearly requires that there should not be any right to picket that business the very next day. There should be some type of reasonable limitation upon the right to picket. Apparently that is what is sought in a portion of the amendment, but in some other of the language on this part of the substitute is awkward, beclouded and, I think, ought to be deleted.

We come to some language which requires cross-examination and discussion. We ought to be the beneficiaries of the pros and cons in this debate, as to what is meant by such language as is found on page 62, in connection with this picketing proposal:

> Where the labor organization cannot establish that there is a sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having such labor organization represent them for collective bargaining purposes—

"Cannot establish" where? Before whom? Under what circumstances? Those are questions which must be answered before we are prepared intelligently to vote on this proposal.

I reiterate that I believe that much in the substitute is good, but I will not vote for all of it, because I still question some of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the Dirksen amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to 2 hours, to be equally controlled by the author of the amendment [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire of the majority leader if he meant by his request that the total debate on the amendment and all perfecting amendments would be 2 hours, or whether he meant that limitation to apply only to the Dirksen amendment and to each of the amendments to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The proposed limitation is 2 hours. I have consulted with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the ranking minority member of the committee——

Mr. ALLOTT. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the very question to which the senior Senator from California addressed himself is already proposed to be taken care of by an amendment of my friend from New York [Mr. KEATING]. As ranking member of the committee, I find no objection to it. I am certain the Senator from Illinois will accept it. It relates to a point which, in the debate in the committee, brought forth much comment, and there was much effort on our part to improve it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, under the unanimous-consent proposal would it be in order for any of our colleagues to offer perfecting amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It would.

Mr. KUCHEL. I have no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, reserving the right to object for the purpose of obtaining a clarification, what would be the time allotted in the case of a perfecting amendment offered to the main bill, in advance of voting on the Dirksen amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There would be such time as Senators who control the time desired to allot.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Would that time come out of the 2 hours?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The proposed limitation relates to the Dirksen amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. A perfecting amendment to the bill itself would be in order, would it not? That would not be an amendment to the Dirksen amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am proposing a limitation of time only on the Dirksen amendment and any amendment thereto. Any time allotted would come out of the 2 hours. The time would be controlled by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] on one side and the majority leader on the other.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As I understood the request presented, it dealt with the Dirksen amendment and any amendments thereto. An amendment to title VI of the bill would not come in that category.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. My purpose was to permit Senators to know with some degree of accuracy when the vote on the Dirksen amendment would be taken, which would be not more than 2 hours from now. Some time will be yielded back. The opponents of the Dirksen amendment tell me that they will use only a few minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It seems to me that the time might be somewhat restricted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will let the request apply to the Dirksen amendment and all amendments thereto, and to any amendment which might perhaps be offered to the bill. Would that meet the Senator's objection?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, is it not possible to have perfecting amendments to the body of the bill offered at some other time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They could be.

Mr. GOLDWATER. We are discussing an amendment relating to one particular title.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, my understanding is that the term "perfecting amendments" relates only to perfecting amendments to the title proposed to be stricken by the Dirksen amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If my request is not clear, I shall be glad to modify it.

I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that there be not to exceed 2 hours debate on the Dirksen amendment and all amendments thereto, or in connection therewith, or perfecting amendments to the bill——

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would have to object to such a limitation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How would the Senator like to have the agreement worded?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. For example, if the Senator from California should wish to insure consideration of a portion of the Dirksen amendment as a perfecting amendment to the bill, and he preferred to vote for the perfecting amendment as such, he should have the right to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He would have.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Debate and such a presentation should not have to come out of 1 hour of time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We have canvassed as many Members as possible. We have learned that the opponents will not consume an hour. Senators desire to make other plans and attend other meetings. It would be desirable if we could obtain a time limitation satisfactory to Senators. Some Senator may have an amendment about which I know nothing. I have talked with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I have talked with the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING]. The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] has no objection. I shall be glad to modify the request so as to include language satisfactory to the Senator from South Dakota, if possible.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is it proposed to proceed with the 2 hours of debate tonight?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] says he will use only 5 or 10 minutes of his hour. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] desires 5 minutes. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] desires 20 or 25 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It is not particularly important so far as I am concerned, but it so happens that the junior Senator from South Dakota has an engagement to speak down town at a District Bar group meeting tonight, and he would like to keep that engagement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If we can obtain the proposed agreement, the Senator can keep his engagement. He could keep an engagement in New York.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to offer an amendment it it seems propitious, dealing with a sentence proposed to be stricken in title VI, before we proceed to a final vote on the Dirksen amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think there would be time for that purpose, even if all the time were used. I am sure that the opponents will not use all of their time. The debate should be concluded by 6:30 or 6:35.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Reading between the lines, it would appear that there is no great prospect of the Dirksen amendment being agreed to, because I do not believe that such a complicated amendment will be accepted, in the present temper of the Senate, with an hour's debate. In view of that fact, and the fact that if the Dirksen amendment is not agreed to, title VI will still be subject to amendment, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the pending amendment, the Dirksen substitute for title VI, is rejected, title VI will then be open to amendment, will it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement as entered was subsequently reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That during the consideration of the bill S. 1555, the so-called Labor bill, further debate on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] striking title VI and substituting language therefor and any amendment thereto, shall be limited to 2 hours to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent thereof and the majority leader.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is controlled by the majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the minority leader or any Senator designated by him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield myself 30 minutes.

I may answer some of my colleagues' fears by stating that if the pending amendment prevails, there will be no need further to amend title VI, and no need for further Taft-Hartley amendments.

I may add further for the comfort of my colleagues that Senators who voted for the Ervin amendment can certainly have no qualms in voting for the pending amendment, because most of us, I am sure, voted for the Ervin amendment in the belief that without provisions concerning secondary boycotts and picketing, title VI is valueless, and that we would like to consider Taft-Hartley amendments at a later date.

Senators who voted against the Ervin amendment in the hope of having some vehicle to which to attach Taft-Hartley amendments will have such a vehicle in the substitute for title VI. In addition, the amendments in which they are interested are included in the substitute for title VI. Every amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act which was contained in title VI, with the exception of that relating to supervisors, is included in the Dirksen substitute for title VI.

In addition to that, there are secondary boycott and picketing prohibitions.

I voted for the Ervin amendment for the reasons I have stated. Now that title VI is a part of the Kennedy-Ervin bill, I have no qualms at all in proceeding to support title V of the administration bill.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] would strike out the provisions of title VI because he considers that amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act are "nongermane" to the purpose of the proposed legislation, which he describes as being to "outlaw malpractices in the internal affairs of unions."

The administration bill has a broader purpose, namely, to curb the improper practices in the labor and management fields revealed by the Senate select committee, and in this respect many of its Taft-Hartley Act amendments are not only germane, but also essential. In this respect, the present provisions of title VI are totally ineffective.

Title VI completely ignores the need to protect employers and employees from recognition or organizational picketing which coerces employees in the exercise of their rights under section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act. Title VI ignores the need to make more effective the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act—to eliminate loopholes which enable neutral employers and employees to be dragged into labor disputes not of their making and which enlarge the area of industrial dispute. Title VI fails to deal with the pressing jurisdictional no man's land in an effective and realistic manner. Without effective provisions in these three areas—secondary boycotts, coercive organizational and recognition picketing, and the no man's land—this proposed legislation will fail to meet the needs demonstrated by the hearings of the select committee.

Corruption in unions and in labor-management relations exists, Mr. President, because corrupt elements have infiltrated into this area. The racketeers who have forced their way into unions did not do so because of any desire to improve the conditions of workers. They were drawn into labor organizations not merely by the possibilities presented by unguarded union treasuries but because certain union activities could be perverted for racketeering, for extorting money, and inducing bribe payments from fearful or corrupt employers. These activities are also the principal causes of labor violence, to which criminal elements have lent their muscle.

The activities to which I refer are coercive organizational and recognition picketing and secondary boycotts. Any program which does not try to eliminate the opportunities for corruption presented by these activities cannot be considered as effectively and fully dealing with improper practices in the field of labor-management relations.

The McClellan committee has heard a great deal of testimony as to how certain unions, particularly the Teamsters, have taken advantage of the inadequacies of the present secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act to force employers to cease doing business with other employers of whom the union disapproves. Yet S. 1555 does nothing to correct these inadequacies.

When the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted in 1947, it was the intent of Congress to do away with secondary boycotts. Evidently Congress at that time overlooked some important fact situations leading to secondary boycotts—at least the Board and the courts consider that we did—and these have been seized upon by those intent upon circumventing the law to achieve objectives otherwise prohibited by the act.

The biggest loophole in the present law is that it does not prohibit a union from using direct pressures upon an employer with the object of forcing him to cease using the products of, or to cease doing business with, another person. If this objective is contrary to public policy, which it is, it is no less contrary to public policy to achieve it through one means rather than another.

Threats of a strike or picketing made directly to an employer can be as effective as the strike or the picketing itself. In this way an employer may be coerced into entering into or living up to hot-cargo agreements, which are standard in Teamster contracts, under which his employees do not have to handle or work on goods produced or handled by another employer who happens to be in disfavor with the union. Under the law a union may not enforce such an agreement by inducing the employees to refuse to perform services. The agreement can be just as effectively enforced, however, by coercion of the employer, which is permitted under the present law.

The present secondary boycott provisions of the act also give no protection to railroads or agricultural enterprises since they are excluded from the term "employer" as defined in the act. Thus, unions which have stopped railroad employees, agricultural workers, and municipal employees from their normal activities in order to retaliate against some other employer have been immune from the act.

The present law also permits the Teamsters Union to appeal to individual truckdrivers to refuse to deliver goods to any establishment, as well as to appeal to other individual union men such as repairmen, and maintenance men, to refuse service, with impunity. Since the appeal or threat is directed to the individual truckdriver and helper or repairman, there is no inducement of a concerted refusal to perform services.

Under this amendment section 8(b)(4) of the act would be amended to make it an unfair labor practice for a union or its agents "to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce" where an object is to force or require that person to cease, or "to agree to cease," doing business with another person. This clause will reach coercive activity directed not only to the employer himself but to any person acting as his agent, such as supervisory and managerial personnel. By adding the words "or to agree to cease" to section 8(b)(4) the amendment would preclude unions from coercing employers to accept hot-cargo contract provisions against their will.

The word "person" is used in the proposed amendment to the secondary boycott provision rather than "employer," in order to extend the protection of the secondary boycott provisions of the act to public employers, railroads, or agricultural enterprises without subjecting them to other provisions of the act. Under the amendment it would also be an unfair labor practice for a union or its agents "to induce or encourage any individual employed by any person engaged in commerce" to engage in a strike or refusal to perform services for the proscribed object. The omission of the word "concerted" is intended to reach inducements to refuse services directed at a single employee of a secondary employer, the cumulative effect of which is no less effective than a concerted refusal in stopping the flow of supplies to a store or factory.

Section 8(b)(4) would also be amended to make it clear that the secondary boycott provisions do not proscribe certain activities which should not be considered to be in the category of secondary boycotts. One of these is union activity affecting a secondary employer who is engaged with the primary employer in work on the same construction site. The other is secondary activity against employers who assist a primary employer in breaking a lawful strike by performing struck work which has been farmed out to him by the primary employer. Although some courts have held that a union may exert economic pressure on the secondary employer who is handling such farmed out struck work, this amendment will write this principle expressly into the statute.

The amendment which I offer would also deal in forthright fashion with the other major abuse which S. 1555 does not now reach, namely, the use of picket lines to force unwilling employees to join a union which they do not want, or to force an employer into recognizing a union against the wishes of his employees. The select committee received considerable testimony as to how such picket lines inflicted so much economic damage on small companies that they were compelled, in order to stay in business, to recognize unions which represented only a small minority or none of their employees. The coercive effect of this picketing on the employees frequently forces them to sign up with an unwanted union if they do not wish their means of livelihood endangered by the employer's declining business.

One of the conclusions of the select committee, stated in its interim report, was that the "weapon of organizational picketing has been abused" by its use "without the consent of the employees of the picketed plant and before some or any of them have indicated a desire to join the union in question." In testimony before the Subcommittee on Labor, Prof. Godfrey P. Schmidt, one of the members of the teamsters' board of monitors, stated that from "conversations with rank and file workers, I am persuaded that they are as convinced as I am that no labor reform can be effectuated unless recognition and organizational picketing is banned."

Under this amendment these forms of picketing would be curtailed without interfering with legitimate union activity. It would be an unfair labor practice for a union to picket, or to threaten to picket, an employer, except under certain specific conditions, when the object is to force or require the employer to recognize it, or the employees to accept or select it, as a bargaining representative. Thus picketing for such an object would be prohibited.

Mr. President, I believe the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has a very well drafted amendment to meet the objections which the Senator from California noticed and which have been noticed before. I will yield to the Senator from New York if he desires to offer the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. President, I offer an amendment on page 62, line 10, of S. 748, which is the Dirksen amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 62, line 10, of Mr. DIRKSEN'S amendment, beginning with the colon, it is proposed to strike out through line 20 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

(B) an election has been held under section 9(c) within the preceding twelve-month period and no labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees, or (C) a petition has been filed under section 9(c)(1)(A) by another labor organization or under section 9(c)(1)(B) by such employer, and such petition is pending before the Board.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the amendment would limit racketeering, blackmail types of organizational picketing, or whatever one chooses to call it, to specific cases, such as where another union has been selected or the employees of the plant have voted for no union, or when a petition is pending by either a union or an employer in a plant which was affected. It would strike out that provision of the picketing amendment which appears to be so general in its language that it seems to me to be open to objection.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does the Senator from New York provide in his amendment, or does the substitute amendment provide, together with his amendment, for picketing when a majority of the employees of the plant have petitioned their employer to recognize the union?

Mr. KEATING. In such a case, if the members of another union had filed a petition or if the employer had filed a petition, picketing would not be allowed.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is a matter for the Labor Relations Board. I have an amendment which I shall offer if something else is not adopted to block it, which would delay the recognition of organizational picketing for 1 year after there had been an election and the employees had rejected a union, or unless a majority of the employees had petitioned their employer for a union.

I am opposed to organizational picketing. I think it is a form of economic coercion which ought to be outlawed. I think it is completely wrong.

But I think the minute a majority of the employees decide they want a union, they are entitled to have it. Although they may have rejected a union within a year's time in an election, if subsequently, within a year's time thereafter, a majority of them petition their employer for the recognition of a certain union to be their bargaining representative, then I think they should have the right to picket.

Mr. KEATING. I judge from what the Senator from Arkansas has said that my amendment does not go as far in one respect, in barring organizational picketing, as does his amendment, but perhaps my amendment goes further in another respect.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. We are dealing now with the Dirksen amendment. I feel that my amendment improves the Dirksen amendment, in that it strikes out section (c), which provides: "Where the labor organization cannot establish that there is a sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having such labor organization represent them for collective bargaining purposes."

I am worried about that language as being rather indefinite and rather difficult to assess. My amendment would limit the bar on this type of picketing to three types of cases: First, when the employer of the plant which it is sought to picket has already recognized, in accordance with the provisions of law, another labor organization; second, where within the past 12 months there has been a valid election in the plant, and the employees voted to have no union; third, where either the labor organization or the employer in the plant which is sought to be picketed has filed a petition for election, and the petition is pending. In those three instances, it seems clear to me that there should be no picketing of the plant.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think I am in full agreement with the general objective of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I simply go one step further and provide that if and when a majority of the employees actually petition their employer for the recognition of a union, and if the employer does not, within 5 days, respond to the request of the majority, they shall have the right to picket.

Mr. KEATING. I think that is perhaps true. I think I might be able to support the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas at the proper time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As we move along, I am trying to get an understanding of the different views, so that we may correlate them and get some good amendments to the bill.

Mr. KEATING. The purpose of my amendment is to make clear and precise the instances in which picketing is not allowed. After all, picketing, indeed, all forms of organizational picketing, are pretty well recognized and cannot be interfered with when they are conducted in a legitimate manner. What is sought to be eliminated by my amendment is what might be termed racket or illegitimate picketing, or a type of picketing which should not be recognized. I feel that this amendment will improve the language of that particular section.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, in our discussions in the committee, the language "sufficient interest" and "a reasonable period of time" generated quite a bit of questioning. While we were discussing the administration's proposal, which contains this language, we were seriously inclined toward changing it. I am very happy, representing the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, am I to understand that the Senator from Arizona is accepting the amendment on behalf of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. The amendment of the Senator from New York is offered to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois; it does not bear on the bill directly.

Mr. KENNEDY. If an employer recognized a Johnny Dio union without an election having been held to choose a union for the purposes of collective bargaining with the employer, what remedy could the AFL–CIO take in order to picket that employer as being unfair to labor, under such an amendment as has been offered?

Mr. KEATING. If the employer has previously recognized in accordance with the National Labor Relations Act, a legitimate labor organization, then an outside labor organization could not picket his plant.

Mr. KENNEDY. In other words, in the case to which we have referred, it would be very possible for an employer to recognize Mr. Dio as the bargaining agent for the employees, without the holding of an election; and then the AFL–CIO, which now is attempting to work against sweetheart contracts in New York, would be limited in what it could do. It would have to take up the matter in a proceeding before the National Labor Relations Board, which would take from 2 to 3 years.

Mr. KEATING. My answer is that in this proposed legislation there should be provisions for dealing separately with "sweetheart" contracts. I do not think this is the appropriate bill in which to deal with that problem.

Mr. KENNEDY. But the Senator would be denying to labor a legitimate right, without in any sense limiting an employer in shopping around for a union which would give him a "sweetheart" contract.

In the bill we have prohibited employer payoffs to union leaders; but there is no way by which we can prevent an employer from making with a union an arrangement which would enable the employer to undersell—through low wages—legitimate employers who were paying decent union wages.

Of course, it is quite proper to tie this provision to the Dirksen amendment; but I still point out to the Senate that this would mean that all other amendments in regard to picketing, as well as in regard to prehiring, and so forth, would be in the third degree; and there are a number of other amendments which I would wish to propose to the Dirksen amendment before it comes to a vote.

Mr. KEATING. There are other amendments of that sort which I should like to see made to the Dirksen amendment; but we are taking these up one at a time; and I believe this one improves the Dirksen amendment.

The situation to which the Senator from Massachusetts has referred sounds to me as if it would constitute an unfair labor practice—if there were such an agreement between an employer and a racket union; and I believe the union would have a perfect right to picket against an unfair labor practice.

This provision would not interfere with picketing against an unfair labor practice, as described by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Unfortunately, it takes from 2 to 3 years for the National Labor Relations Board to determine whether an unfair labor practice has been engaged in.

I would think that, under various decisions of the Board, it might hold that the union was picketing for recognition; and, therefore, the language proposed by the Senator from New York would prohibit the union from carrying on picketing under those conditions.

Mr. KEATING. Certainly the language of the amendment offered to the Dirksen amendment improves the language of the existing antipicketing provision, because it makes it definite.

The Senator from Massachusetts may be opposed to any antipicketing provision of any kind; but, in my judgment, this provision does improve the present rather unprecise language of this picketing provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I did not think the Senate had to vote on the amendment to the amendment, because the Senator from Arizona had accepted it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I did not think so, either.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the Dirksen amendment; and therefore it cannot be modified or changed, except by unanimous consent or by amendment by way of motion.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand, the vote just taken was on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], which the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], on behalf of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], had already accepted as an amendment to the Dirksen amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It could not be accepted, except by unanimous consent, inasmuch as the yeas and nays had previously been ordered on the question of agreeing to the Dirksen amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Keating amendment to the Dirksen amendment has, by motion, already been agreed to.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, what is there to prevent our taking a voice vote, and in that way adopting the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That has been done. The Chair was referring to the parliamentary rule that, after the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of agreeing to an amendment, it can be modified only by unanimous consent.

Mr. President, I ask that the Chair clarify the situation as regards the time remaining to each side, in view of the time which in the last few minutes has been used by the Senator from Massachusetts, because our side has only 1 hour and his side has only 1 hour; and I would not wish to transgress on the time available to Senators who are about to enter the Chamber.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time I have used in questioning the Senator from New York be charged to the time available to me, rather than to the time available to the Senator from Arizona. I believe I used about 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, this proposal does not affect picketing against employer unfair labor practices. It would not prevent a legitimate union from bona fide picketing against an employer who had entered into a "sweetheart contract" or who utilized "sweatshop labor." It would not bar organizational or recognition picketing, for example, if the incumbent union was a minority union—that is, a union which has not been designated as bargaining representative by an uncoerced majority of the employees. Such a union would not be recognized in accordance with the act. Nor would it bar such picketing if the incumbent union, first, was dominated or assisted by the employer, in violation of the act, second, had established its majority status by fraudulent means, third, had an existing contract which contained an illegal union security provision, or fourth, had a contract which had been in effect for more than 2 years.

Senate bill 1555 attempts to deal with abuses of the picket line by amending section 302 of the National Labor Relations Act only to make so-called "extortion" picketing unlawful—in this case, a misdemeanor. This limited provision does not begin to reach the real problem. The conduct which it prescribes is already subject to criminal penalties as a felony under the Hobbs Act. In addition to its failure to reach the real problem area of coercive picketing, this provision of the bill so cuts across the provisions of the Hobbs Act that it could limit the effectiveness of that act.

With respect to the no man's land problem, this bill completely ignores the select committee's recommendation that—

> Any State or Territory should be authorized to assume and assert jurisdiction over labor disputes over which the Board declines jurisdiction.

The amendment which I offer would carry out that recommendation.

This amendment would specifically authorize the Board to decline jurisdiction over cases which, in its opinion, do not sufficiently affect commerce to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction. This is a discretionary power which the Board has been exercising during its entire history, under both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act. The provisions of the amendment, therefore, would write into the statute an existing implicit power, and would not mean any change in practice.

The amendment, as recommended by the McClellan committee, would authorize the States to assume and assert jurisdiction over cases over which the Board declines to assert jurisdiction. Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in the Guss case, the agencies and courts assumed that they had this authority, and they asserted jurisdiction over such cases. The effect of the amendment, therefore, is to make legal what many thought was legal until the Supreme Court decided otherwise.

The present provision in the bill which purports to deal with the no man's land would, in my opinion, have the same effect as the provision in the Kennedy-Ervin bill, as introduced, which would have required the National Labor Relations Board to assert jurisdiction over all disputes arising under the act. Any realist knows that it is simply not practical for the Board to attempt to assert jurisdiction over the full reach of the act—over the countless numbers of disputes in small establishments, which may technically affect commerce, but which are primarily local. To do so would so increase the Board's caseload, and therefore the period of time required to dispose of cases, as to render the Board's processes ineffectual.

The provision in Senate bill 1555 attempts to meet these objections by permitting the Board to delegate its jurisdiction to State agencies, but in such a manner as to make the State agency a mere arm of the Board in the administration of the Federal law. The implication is that by entering into such agreements the Board will be able to relieve itself of the burden which would be imposed by asserting jurisdiction over essentially local cases which do not significantly affect commerce. It is extremely doubtful, however, that the authority given the Board to delegate its jurisdiction can be utilized. Only eight States have a State agency with which the Board could enter into an agreement, and it is doubtful that any one of these agencies presently has authority to enter into the sort of agreement authorized by S. 1555.

Even if enactment of implementing legislation by several of the States made it possible for the Board to enter into a few scattered agreements, there would be no overall reduction in the amount of work to be done by the Board. In its strenuous efforts to make any State agency which enters into such an agreement completely subservient to the Board, S. 1555 requires that processes and orders issued by the State agency be enforced by the Board. A refusal by the State agency to issue a complaint on an unfair labor practice charge or proceed with a petition for representation would be appealable to the Board. The appellate and policing burden placed on the Board by any agreement would probably offset any reduction in workload otherwise accomplished by the agreement.

This amendment would substitute for the present provisions of S. 1555, permitting prehire agreements in the construction industry, the administration's proposal, which would permit, under appropriate circumstances, the certification of building trades unions as bargaining representatives without a prior hearing.

This proposal would require a joint petition by the employer and union involved asserting present recognition of the union by the employer as the bargaining representative of his employees and the existence of a collective bargaining agreement between them. A history of a collective bargaining relationship between the union and the employer prior to the current agreement would be required. Certification under this proposal would not be available if the Board found that a substantial number of the employees in the unit in question asserted that the union was not designated or selected as bargaining agent by a majority of such employees.

It has long been recognized that the hiring practices and collective bargaining relationships in the construction industry are unlike those in manufacturing and in other service industries, and are difficult to accommodate under the representation procedures of the National Labor Relations Act. These procedures were designed to deal with employment relationships which are of some permanence, and they have proved ineffective where, as in the construction industry, the employment is casual and intermittent and the employee may be employed by several employers within a short period of time. Proposals have been made from time to time to amend the act so as to enable the construction industry's labor relations to come into conformity with the representation provisions of the act.

The present proposal provides a means whereby construction unions may acquire Board certification as exclusive bargaining representatives. There are several advantages accruing to a union as the result of Board certification. Conversely, there are disadvantages resulting from lack of certification—disadvantages which construction unions have suffered only because the employment patterns in their industry made certification impossible under the existing provisions of the act.

The effect of this proposal would be to protect voluntary collective bargaining relationships established in good faith without governmental intervention. The proposal protects the right of the employees to be free of coercion in the selection of their own bargaining representatives; the will of the employees in this respect would be required to be evidenced by a history of prior collective bargaining between the union and the employer and by an absence of substantial objection on the part of the employees in the bargaining unit to certification of the union.

The present provision of S. 1555 with respect to prehire agreements in the construction industries, I submit, goes beyond what is needed to place building trades unions on an equal basis, under the act, with unions in other industries. Under these provisions, employers and unions in the construction industry would be permitted to enter into collective bargaining contracts before any of the employees were ever hired, and consequently before the wishes of the yet-to-be-hired employees concerning their representation were ascertained. S. 1555 would permit such contracts to provide for 7-day union shops. It would expressly sanction, for the construction industry, hiring practices and contract provisions which have been subject to extensive litigation before the Labor Board and the courts.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we should not place the unions in the building and construction field in a position of special privilege, at the expense of the employees in that industry. We should not specifically legalize certain hiring arrangements in that industry while the legality of such arrangement in other industries remains subject to administrative and judicial determination.

What we should do, Mr. President, is to create the conditions and procedures whereby all parties in the construction industry can, as far as practicable, enjoy the same rights and privileges that have long been regarded as a matter of course in the other industries. The amendment I offer would do this by allowing the Labor Board to issue certifications in that industry without the requirement of elections, which as a practical matter cannot be held, but with safeguards to ensure that only unions which are the representatives of the employees affected receive the benefit of such certifications. Such certifications would benefit all parties concerned, since a certification is, under most circumstances, conclusively established for a period of a year. The unions, the employers, and the employees are usually insulated against the unstabilizing effects of rival union raiding for that period, and picketing for recognition by rival unions is prohibited by the law. These benefits are enjoyed by unions, employers, and employees in the other industries covered by the Taft-Hartley law; and by enacting this amendment we can create equal rights throughout these industries, rather than replace one inequality with another one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Will the Senator suspend? The 30 minutes the Senator from Arizona has yielded to himself have expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield myself another 10 minutes.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on this subject?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. KUCHEL. I read, at the bottom of page 64, line 20——

Mr. GOLDWATER. Where is the Senator reading from? Is he reading from the text of S. 748?

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes, S. 748, at page 64, line 20, the new language which is suggested:

Provided, That the Board may, without prior thereto having conducted an election by secret ballot, certify a labor organization referred to in clause (C) of this paragraph as the exclusive representative of employees of an employer referred to in said clause (C) in such unit as the Board may find is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rate of pay, wages, hours, and other conditions of employment * * *

I think I understand that language, and, like my friend from Arizona, I think I favor it, but here is my question: What does the following language mean? I read it:

Provided further, That the preceding proviso shall not apply where there is no history of a collective bargaining relationship between the petitioning employer and labor organization prior to the current agreement or an employee or group of employees or any individual or labor organization acting in their behalf allege, and the Board finds, that a substantial number of employees presently employed by the employer in the bargaining unit assert that the labor organization is not a representative as defined in section 9(a).

Will the Senator discuss the reasons back of the language relating to no prior history, and so forth?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The object is the protection of the worker. It would be wrong, in our estimation, for a union to bargain with a contractor, let us say, without any prior history. The rights of a worker might be excluded. Let us not use the word "exclude." The rights of a worker might be overlooked or destroyed. If there were allowed in the construction trade a hiring hall, which many feel is necessary to the proper operation of that industry—and I shall not argue against that point—we should protect, as much as we can, those who are members of a union, and exclude, let us say, favoritism of a union member over a nonunion member.

Mr. KUCHEL. Let us consider one of the great reclamation projects in the West, for example, one of the great construction projects on the upper Colorado or one of the great reclamation projects in California which my friend helps me to obtain for my State. Sometimes, in order to have sufficient business organization borrowing authority, and the like, it is oftentimes necessary for several contractors to join together for a particular project, and thus to become a new employing unit. If that were so, then there would be no history of bargaining.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Oh, yes. I will say that we in Arizona sometimes look generously upon people who want to work on our projects, but at times we do not like the people who want to take our water but still want to work.

The situation the Senator describes would be taken care of, because each contractor or subcontractor would deal with his separate union or unions.

Mr. KUCHEL. Where does the language say that?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is the interpretation. It is not spelled out in each case, but I think the act itself is very plain.

Mr. KUCHEL. The words on lines 4 and 5, I will say to my friend, are "there is no history of a collective bargaining relationship between the petitioning employer."

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct. The language does not say "contract," it says "relationship." In other words, this language is to protect the employee on the job. The employer or the contractor cannot engage nonunion employees if they have a history of a bargaining relationship. The language does not mean there must be a contract. The language means that contractor X at some time must have bargained with or done business with union Y. This would apply to all contractors, whether they be prime contractors or subcontractors.

Mr. KUCHEL. I think what the Senator says is helpful for the legislative history, but I must say that when the words "the petitioning employer" are used, on page 65, line 5, they could very well mean a business unit which was brand new, which had never engaged in any relationship or bargaining with any labor organization whatsoever prior to that time.

I think what the Senator has said in answering these questions is an indication that, in the Senator's judgment, when the words "the petitioning employer" are used, they apply to those situations in which a business unit is created from several others, some of which may have had a history of bargaining relationships.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct. The language would apply even down to the subcontractors. It is quite difficult to imagine contractors or subcontractors being in such a position, because most of them have at some time done business with a union. What we are trying to prevent is damage to the rights and privilege of the workers, either employed or seeking employment.

Mr. KUCHEL. I will say to my friend—and I am relying on an extremely faulty memory—some of the associated general contractors from the State, I, in part represent, discussed that very point a couple of years ago in the testimony they gave. As I was reading this rather lengthy amendment over quickly, this was an item I thought I should ask the Senator to discuss.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will say to my friend from California that I participated in the original discussions of the proposal in 1953 and 1954, which were attended in part by the late Senator Taft. During those meetings, we had before us the largest contractors of the country and representatives of the large construction unions. This particular problem was discussed specifically.

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. This provision merits some study by the Senator from California, because in my opinion the theatrical unions are affected in a like way; and I believe the maritime unions are, also, so far as the 7-day clause is concerned.

This amendment contains a provision, not present in title VI of S. 1555, which makes it clear that a party to a contract may not be required to bargain during the life of the contract with respect to any condition of employment. This is designed to correct interpretations of the present law under which, upon a demand of either party to a contract, the other party may be compelled to bargain with respect to terms and conditions not expressly covered by the contract.

This proposal would promote stability in collective bargaining. It would remove an element of uncertainty in the contractual relationship which detracts from industrial harmony.

A provision of the proposed amendment would require the National Labor Relations Board to be bipartisan. It would provide that no more than three members could be affiliated with the same political party.

This is a customary requirement in the composition of regulatory agencies; it is a part of the basic laws of agencies such as the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Civil Aeronautics Board. The Civil Service Commission, which compares with the Board in that it deals with employee relations, is required to be bipartisan in its composition. There is no reason for considering the Board differently in this respect.

The amendment contains a provision which would eliminate the statutory bar against voting in representation elections by replaced economic strikers. Title VI of S. 1555 contains a similar provision.

Both the amendment and title VI contain provisions, in different phraseology, authorizing the Board to conduct prehearing representation elections.

This amendment and the present title VI both contain provisions authorizing the President to designate an Acting General Counsel of the Board in the event of a vacancy in that office which cannot quickly be filled. Here again, the language of the provision in the present title VI is acceptable as a substitute for mine, if it is so desired.

Mr. President, I do not think that these differing amendments of the Taft-Hartley Act are nongermane to the pending legislation. On the contrary, certain amendments to the act are essential if the legislation is to be effective. Any legislation which fails to amend the Taft-Hartley Act so as to tighten the secondary boycott provisions, to eliminate blackmail picketing, and effectively to deal with the "no man's land" problem is no more than a half measure.

Mr. President, these amendments of the Taft-Hartley Act are eminently germane but let us have amendments which will help carry out the task of cleaning out corruption and racketeering in labor-management relations.

Mr. President, we should substitute for title VI of the pending bill as a package the administration proposals of title V of S. 748. We will be doing the constructive thing by accepting this amendment, because the administration proposals, for the reasons I have stated, are far preferable to the provisions of title VI.

The motion to strike out title VI was made because its provisions are considered only sweeteners to induce hurried passage of the bill. Title V of S. 748, on the other hand, is a fair and balanced program to assure true labor reform.

In closing, Mr. President, I should like to remind my Republican colleagues that what I have been proposing this afternoon, and what the distinguished Senator from Illinois, the minority leader, has proposed in the way of a substitute, is the language of the administration's bill. I repeat what I said at the start: If a Senator voted against the Ervin amendment he can vote for this amendment, and if he voted for the Ervin amendment he can vote for this amendment, in good conscience.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time does the Senator from Arizona have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted to the Senator from Arizona has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. And we have 57 minutes remaining?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Has all my time expired? I do not believe I have used all my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. On the Dirksen amendment the Senator has an additional 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Arizona, to yield back all but 5 minutes of our time, if the Senator from Arizona will do the same, if we may have a quorum call without the time being charged to either side.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The only objection the junior Senator from Arizona would have to that suggestion is that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] wanted to address himself to this subject. I think he wanted 10 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is the Senator from South Dakota prepared to speak now?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I cannot speak for him. I have not seen him for about an hour. I think we can find him.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum and that the time taken to call the roll not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I send to the desk four amendments, proposed in my Senate speech yesterday, which, in my opinion, are imperative to correct certain inadequacies and deficiencies in the so-called Kennedy-Ervin bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be printed and will lie on the table.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes, if I have such authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENNEDY. What is the question?

Mr. MUNDT. I am trying to establish that I have 10 minutes. I will take it from the time allotted to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. KENNEDY. Very well.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, yesterday in discussing the pending labor legislation, and specifically the Ervin amendment, I urged that the Senate vote for the Ervin amendment to strike title VI, because it seemed to me that our major responsibility was to write labor reform legislation, devoid of extraneous material, and adequately written to provide the necessary correctives for the type of abuses being exposed by the McClellan committee. I wanted this to be essentially a bill to correct the abuses disclosed by our Senate Labor Rackets Committee.

However, the Senate has overwhelmingly voted to keep title VI in the bill. That means that we now have before us, for the remainder of the debate, the whole gamut of problems confronting the labor-management situation.

As I have stated, there were certain phases of title VI which I thought were good legislation, which I am happy to support, although I feel that by cluttering up the labor reform legislation by the extraneous items now in the bill, we tend to defeat the major purpose and the major responsibility of the Senate in dealing with racketeerism, corruption, and arrogant power in the labor union movement.

That, however, is a part of the debate which has been decided by a yea-and-nay vote. Consequently, since we are to consider Taft-Hartley amendments, and since we are to consider amendments which are not germane to the problems of corruption and racketeerism, I speak in support of the Dirksen substitute, because it seems to me that in several ways it is a better approach and a better piece of legislation than is title VI.

In addition to the fact that by the decision of the Senate title VI is taken out of the jurisdiction of the blue ribbon panel which presumably will study and report on the Taft-Hartley amendments, it seems to me that this diversionary approach now places before us the heavy responsibility of determining just what Taft-Hartley amendments are necessary to improve the labor movement.

It seems to me that the provision dealing with the judicial "no man's land," as it is found in the Dirksen substitute, is far superior to the committee provisions, because it gives definite jurisdiction to the State courts and the State labor boards in those cases in which the NLRB fails or refuses to assert jurisdiction.

In other words, it preserves the rights of States, the autonomy of States, and moves further in the direction of clearing up the no man's land instead of perpetuating it merely by presenting another decision to be made by the National Labor Relations Board, which is already overcrowded with work and overloaded with decisions which it has difficulty in reaching.

The Kennedy-Ervin provision in title VI would eliminate State courts so far as concerns hearing any labor cases, and would require instead the establishment of State labor boards to operate under Federal mandates. Only 12 of the 50 States in the Union now have such boards. Consequently the proposed legislation would be effective in only 12 States, unless, by Federal coercion and compulsion, other States were compelled to do something which, in their own good judgment, they have not done heretofore, namely, to create State labor boards.

The Dirksen substitute provides in the no man's land provision that State courts shall have jurisdiction, and that if the National Labor Relations Board fails to act the authority shifts to the State, where it can be implemented in conformity with the desires and attitudes of the citizens of our respective States.

The administration provision, as exemplified in the Dirksen substitute with regard to the no man's land, is in line with recommendations made by the McClellan committee in its interim report of a year ago. It is also in line with the recommendations of the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Mitchell. I feel it should be substituted for the language in title VI of the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

Mr. President, I also favor the Dirksen substitute approach dealing with prehire agreements in the building-construction trades. The Dirksen substitute requires that a history of collective bargaining between the employer and the union be present before the certification requirements of the Taft-Hartley Act may be ignored. It also provides for greater protection to the union members against job-referral discrimination.

The whole subject of prehire agreements is one in which there is considerable controversy and considerable misunderstanding. Some building-trade unions feel this is very important to the success and protection of their members. Some contractors and builders are of that opinion also, while others definitely hold the contrary point of view. However, if we are to follow the philosophy which, in my opinion, should govern our decisions in this legislative approach to meet the problems disclosed by the McClellan hearings, we should keep in mind constantly the desires, the freedom, and the independence of the trade-union members, and to give these trade-union members the maximum protection, and to provide that protection as well to the employer and to the general public. It seems to me obvious that the proposal for the prehire agreements as incorporated in the Dirksen substitute is an optimum approach as compared with the manner in which it is handled in title VI in the bill now before us. The Dirksen approach protects the rights of workers; the Kennedy-Ervin approach protects the powers of labor leaders.

The Dirksen substitute will continue in force the standards and criteria established by the National Labor Relations Board in the Pacific Mountain case for union hiring halls in the building and construction trades. On the other hand, the committee bill has the effect of overruling this protective decision of the Board.

Secondly, Mr. President, as one who voted for the Ervin proposal to strike title VI from the bill, so that we could have a clean piece of proposed legislation dealing with the establishment of democratic rights and the protective action required to eliminate racketeerism and corruption from labor unions, and who now finds himself, as do other Senators, dealing with the whole pattern of performance insofar as labor-management relations are concerned, I urge strongly now that we accept the Dirksen substitute. It does those things which are desired to be done in an optimum manner.

It does them in the manner recommended as appropriate by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Mitchell.

In addition, it deals with two important factors entirely overlooked by title VI as it is now before us. It does something effective from the standpoint of blackmail picketing. Over and over again, before our committee, witness after witness has said if there were a Federal law effectively administered against blackmail picketing, we could eliminate much of the source of corruption and of abuse of power. In addition, we would take away the opportunity of a corrupt labor boss or, at times, a racketeer masquerading as a labor boss, from holding a loaded pistol at the head, sometimes of an employer and sometimes of the employees, to coerce human beings to do things against their will, by the utilization of blackmail picketing.

The provisions contained in the Dirksen substitute provide adequately for a continuation of picketing when it has to do with the legitimate aspirations of men and women to become union members and to develop for themselves a union contract with an employer.

The second big loophole which is plugged by the Dirksen proposal, as against the deficiencies which are contained in the provisions of title VI in the bill, is the fact that it does something in the field of secondary boycotts. In a reasonable and rational manner it gives the employers and employees alike protection against the promiscuous use of secondary boycotts.

It seems to me that if we are to legislate at all in the general field of labor legislation the Senate would be notoriously derelict in its responsibilities if it eliminated action in the two fields where, after 24 months of expensive investigation, the evidence is clear that corrective legislation of that kind is required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 10 minutes of the Senator from South Dakota have expired.

Mr. MUNDT. Very well. I conclude by urging my colleagues to support the Dirksen substitute for title VI, inasmuch as we have now decided to enter into the activities of general labor legislation.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the Dirksen substitute for title VI. I send it to the desk and ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be waived and that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment, offered by Mr. CURTIS, is as follows:

On page 65, between lines 11 and 12 of the bill S. 748, it is proposed to insert the following new subsection:

"(c) Nothing contained in the foregoing subsections shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State or Territory in which such execution or application is prohibited by State or Territorial law."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, my amendment lifts language from the Kennedy bill and places it in the Dirksen substitute. That language protects State right-to-work laws. I am wondering whether, without further discussion, the distinguished Senator from Arizona would accept my proposal as an amendment to the Dirksen substitute. The language is contained in the committee bill. I wonder whether he will accept it in connection with the substitute.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to accept the amendment to the substitute, proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

VALUE OF U.S. BONDS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator from Tennessee may require.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on yesterday the market value of U.S. Government bonds experienced a further sharp decline. Twenty-one issues hit new lows for the year and many of them represented alltime lows. Two and one-half percent bonds were bid at 83 30/32.

Mr. President, the bond prices as quoted on the New York market yesterday reflect billions of dollars of losses to those who hold these bonds. The total par value of outstanding marketable bonds is $84.19 billion. On the basis of bid prices quoted in today's issue of the New York Times, the market value of these bonds as of yesterday was $76.98 billion, which is $7,207,000,000 below par.

Those who purchased these bonds at par value were purchasing a solemn obligation of the United States, and thereby expressing their faith in the credit of the United States. The enormous losses reflected in the current market value of these bonds are due in large measure to the monetary and credit policies which have been followed by the administration.

Already during this month, the month of April, holders of Government bonds have lost an additional $350 million. These are further losses on the market since March 31.

Mr. President, this is a serious matter. Only 3 weeks ago, on the floor of the Senate, I warned the Senate, the country, and the Government that, unless the policies were altered and unless action to remedy the damaging situation were taken, we could expect further depreciation and further devaluation of the bonds of the U.S. Government. We are experiencing such devaluation almost daily. Yesterday, 21 issues sold at lows for the year, many of them at lows for all history.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] as amended.

Mr. KENNEDY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. It is an extremely far-reaching amendment. If it were adopted, it would be impossible for any Senator to offer amendments dealing with picketing, secondary boycotts, no man's land, prehiring agreements, or the building trades, all of which are extremely controversial and should be the subject of individual action by individual Senators.

If the amendment of the Senator from Illinois were agreed to such amendments as I have indicated would then be in the third degree and thus the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and other Senators would be precluded from offering amendments which are the result of long preparation.

I point to two amendments which I think indicate the careful consideration which this matter should have. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, as I understand, repeals the Denver Building case. If adopted, it would permit picketing to be practiced on a site against nonunion persons being hired. That in itself is an extremely substantial amendment, one which I am certain Senators would want to consider very carefully. It is not a part of our bill. We do not go that far in relaxing the picketing sections of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Second, the committee has rewritten the section with respect to prehearing elections. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois does not provide for at least 30 days in which both parties can present their viewpoints. A request might be made for an election, such as occurred in the days right after World War II, and the election might be held in 2, 3, or 4 days, a so-called quickie election. We requested the representatives of the chamber of commerce to rewrite that section so as to provide for a hearing by the National Labor Relations Board, and that there should be at least a 30-day interval between the request for an election and the holding of the election. That is denied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment of the Senator from Illinois would make all other amendments to those categories amendments in the third degree and out of order, although they deal with subjects which have far-reaching effects.

I hope the Senate will decide to consider such amendments one by one on their merits, rather than by having them all lumped together.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself not to exceed 3 minutes. Let me make three answers to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

First, in connection with his expression of solicitude about organizational picketing and secondary boycotts, proposals on those matters were presented in the committee, and all of them were rejected. We can well understand that the Senator from Massachusetts will be against every one of those amendments if they are offered individually.

Second, I answer the Senator from Massachusetts by saying that all the recitals he has made are covered by the substitute, including provision to fill vacancies in the office of the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board; secondary boycotting; prehiring agreements so far as the construction industry is concerned, and organizational picketing. Everything of that nature is contained in the amendment in the nature of a substitute. So if the substitute is adopted, obviously we will have in the bill those proposals which have the greatest appeal to the country and on which Senators have received a great amount of mail over a long period of time.

The third answer I make is that the administration bill was carefully prepared over a long period of time by experts in the Department of Labor. It has the approval and the sanction of the Secretary of Labor and the President of the United States. It is the administration bill and was introduced as such. Let no one for a moment think there will be any relenting in the effort to knock down every amendment dealing with these great challenges on the labor front, notably blackmail picketing, secondary boycotts, and the other items which are contained in the amendment.

If Senators want all these items in one package, here it is. It represents the viewpoint of the present administration. With that statement, I am content to rest my case.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time if the Senator from Illinois will yield back the remainder of his time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois in the nature of a substitute, as amended. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAPEHART (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay"; if I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." Therefore I withhold my vote.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] are absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] would each vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 67, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON].

REPEAL OF TRANSPORTATION TAX SOUGHT

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the leadership furnished by the Senate during the 85th Congress in effecting the repeal of the 3-percent tax on transportation of goods is well remembered.

Remembered as well is the Senate's vote to terminate the 10-percent tax on domestic transportation of individuals. Unfortunately, the repeal of this tax was lost in conference.

Now comes a reminder from the American Automobile Association pointing out how essential it is that this tax be repealed as well.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a recent news release issued by the AAA.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AAA LAUDS SMATHERS' TAX REPEAL MEASURE

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 8.—Reaffirming its long-established policy opposing Federal taxes on the travel of persons, the American Automobile Association's executive committee, convening at Miami Beach yesterday, lauded Florida Senator GEORGE SMATHERS for his efforts to obtain congressional repeal of the 10-percent domestic transportation tax.

SMATHERS recently introduced a bill (S. 5) calling for repeal of the levy which he termed "regressive, discriminatory, and outdated." The tax produces approximately $220 million annually for the Federal Treasury.

Commenting on the measure, AAA President Frederick T. McGuire, Jr., of Cleveland, said:

"AAA believes that any tax on travel not only is a deterrent to travel, but an unreasonable levy on the users of common carriers. The 10-percent tax on transportation tickets was imposed during the war for the purpose of discouraging civilian use of the carriers so that they could be utilized to the maximum degree for the benefit of the war effort. The necessity for the tax no longer prevails."

McGuire added that Senator SMATHERS' bill, while having some feature of a tax relief measure, has as its primary purpose the strengthening of the Nation's transportation economy.

"Since the tax is deductible as a business expense," McGuire stated, "it reduces taxable income. In this sense, the existing tax is self-defeating as a source of Federal revenue. It is paradoxical that we should continue a tax designed to discourage travel at the same time we are seeking means of strengthening our economy and encouraging expansion of our national transportation system."

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the American Merchant Marine, in company with the shipping of all the world, is having its troubles. Foreign trade is down, and cargoes are scarce. World tonnage is far in excess of current needs. As a result, freight rates are down to the point where U.S. flag vessels find it difficult, if not actually impossible, to be competitive.

To cap it all, certain shipping conference agreements, under which our shipping has been able to work cooperatively with their foreign competitors, have been questioned by the Supreme Court. The problems thus created must be resolved before temporary "status quo" legislation enacted last year expires on June 30, 1960.

It is a matter of urgent importance to the great maritime industry of our country, one that merits the most thorough attention of all Members of this body.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by me be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

I refer to the question of steamship conference dual rate agreements, concerning which concurrent studies are being conducted by the House Judiciary Committee and the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee is actively following these hearings, and will start its own hearings when they will serve a constructive purpose.

The term "dual rates" refers to contractual agreements between the steamship conferences and exporters of this and other lands, under the terms of which a lower freight rate is made available to shippers who agree to use, and do so use, conference vessels exclusively.

This system has been known as dual rate, contract-noncontract, shipper's rate agreement, etc. But whatever the name, it is an exclusive patronage plan whereby the shipper, who agrees to ship exclusively on the conference serving a particular trade route, benefits from a lower freight rate. This enables the conference carriers to arrange their schedules and plan their sailings so as to avoid a concentration of tonnage capacity at the peak season and little or no tonnage at all when cargo availability is lower. One of the real benefits of this system is to the smaller shipper whose cargoes may not arrive at dockside when there is the peak tonnage available. The conference system guarantees him service when the amount of his cargo would not justify an independent operation continuing.

Dual rate and conference systems tend to flatten out rates to a point where they are constant over periods of peak tonnage and low tonnage. This is confirmed by the experience prior to the act of 1916 and in the Japanese-Atlantic Conference since the Supreme Court held that dual-rate illegal. In each case there were enormous rate vacillations, demoralizing to both carriers and shippers.

These conference agreements have been authorized by statute since 1916. They were written into law by the Congress, after a thorough study by a special House committee established for the purpose. They were authorized on the ground that they afforded the only feasible basis upon which vessels of various nations, competing on particular trade routes, could avoid the recurring freight rate wars that had plagued the maritime industry throughout the years.

The Merchant Marine Act of 1916 specifically provides that the Federal Maritime authorities may by order disapprove, cancel, or modify such conference agreements, but when and as long as they are approved the agreements are excepted from certain antitrust statutes.

On May 19, 1958, however, the United States Supreme Court, by majority opinion, declared illegal the dual-rate system of the Japan-Atlantic and Gulf Freight Conference, finding that this particular agreement was a predatory device aimed at a particular competitor. A dissenting opinion said the practical effect of the decision was to hold all dual-rate systems illegal.

Between them, the Court opinions cast doubt on the legality of all such conference agreements. As a result, and because of the vital importance to United States shipping of some method of achieving stability in ocean freight rates, the 85th Congress approved legislation to declare legal until June 30, 1960, the conference dual-rate agreements then in force. This was done to preserve the status quo while opportunity is afforded for study and possible resolution of the problem.

The current investigations of steamship conference policies, including dual rates, is long overdue. It has been more than 40 years since Congress has looked searchingly into operations in this highly competitive sphere. Few areas of law have gone this long without check or revision. I hope that when the Senate does consider the matter there will be full understanding of the complexities inherent in these cooperative efforts on the international level.

Whatever the merits of the cases for and against the continued operation of the dual-rate system, I request the Senators to keep informed as much as possible; for we will in the not too distant future be called upon to decide this highly important question, affecting trade and commerce as well as defense and foreign relations.

The carriage of oceanborne commerce is an industry characterized by a very high capital investment, large fixed operating costs, and the obligations and responsibilities of the common carrier. There is, in addition, intense competition fired by easy market access and an oversupply of carrying capacity.

When the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee studies the dual-rate system, we will concern ourselves with concrete facts and documented economic surveys based on logic and free of the emotions frequently attendant on a study of such great significance in the transportation field. Our aim is to preserve rate stability and service frequency with whatever wise limitations and regulations are dictated by the past experience of shippers, carriers and consumers.

EVENING SCHEDULES FOR INFORMATIVE PROGRAMS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, two informative programs, well known to the American public, "The American Forum of the Air" and "Youth Wants to Know," have had evening schedules this season.

This has made both programs available to a larger potential audience than was possible when they were telecast Sunday afternoon in previous seasons.

Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. and Theodore Granik have worked to make this possible.

Westinghouse has recorded by video tape both "The American Forum of the Air" and "Youth Wants to Know," distributing them to television stations throughout the Nation so that they could be seen regularly, on a once-a-month basis.

Several of the Members of the Senate have already appeared in this new series. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] opened the new series, discussing the need for labor legislation, and during the past week the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] discussed the controversial civil rights proposals pending before the Senate. On "Youth Wants to Know" the guest was a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], who was questioned by high school students regarding his recent trip to the Soviet Union.

Evidence of the acceptability of this new scheduling is presented in a recent article in Radio-Television Daily, in a story entitled "WBC Will Syndicate Granik Taped Shows." I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WBC WILL SYNDICATE GRANIK TAPED SHOWS

The two 30-minute programs, "American Forum of the Air" and "Youth Wants To Know," will be placed in videotape syndication for TV stations across the country later this month by the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., it was announced yesterday by Donald H. McGannon, president.

Both programs, as well as a radio version of "American Forum of the Air," are being produced by WBC in cooperation with Theodore Granik, founder of both programs. They will be aired by WBC stations with the first "American Forum of the Air," scheduled for presentation sometime during the week of February 23, which thereafter will alternate the first and third week of each month with "Youth Wants To Know."

A separate half-hour presentation of "Forum" will also be carried by WBC radio stations on a 52-week basis beginning the first of March. This, too, will be syndicated to radio stations from coast to coast.

PRIME NIGHT SHOWS

WBC will place all programs in prime evening times, between 7:30 and 10 p.m.

In addition special report programs on major contemporary problems on the American scene, with a combination of both discussion and documentary-type formats, will be offered twice a year by each of the TV programs. At present, these are not included in syndication plans but they are likely to be in the future.

One of the factors behind the program projects, Mr. McGannon said, was a growing appetite by Americans for information and background in the crucial issues of the day. Such programing "will achieve a service beyond the present accomplishments of the networks and broadcasters."

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I will say to Senators that the Senate will stay in session long enough to accommodate any Senator who has any statement he cares to make for the RECORD, but we do not expect any more record votes or any votes of any kind this evening.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today it stand in adjournment until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I announce that it may be necessary to have an evening session tomorrow. I should like all Senators to be on notice.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment 4–17–59–BB and ask that it be made the pending question.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 51, between lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to add the following new subsection:

( ) "Officer" of a labor organization means any constitutional officer, any member of a board, council, committee, or other body authorized to exercise governing or executive functions with respect to such labor organization, or any official or employee of a labor organization, regardless of how selected, who exercises or is authorized to exercise any governing or executive functions in such labor organization, and includes, but is not limited to, organizers, business agents, regional directors, managers, and trustees of subordinate labor organizations as well as officials designated as or performing the functions of president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer of a labor organization.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I do not desire to have the Senate take action on the amendment tonight, but I will hold it for action in the morning.

Mr. President, I have a statement to make on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

The Senator from Nebraska wishes to announce that he will join with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] in offering his amendment to outlaw secondary boycotts, which is amendment 4–17–59–C; and that he will also join with the Senator from Arkansas in offering his amendment relating to hot cargo, 4–17–59–D, and his amendment on organizational picketing, 4–17–59–A; and that the Senator from Nebraska will not offer his amendments on the same subjects.

TIMBER SET-ASIDES FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have just received a copy of a letter which Wendell Barnes, Administrator of the Small Business Administration, sent to the Portland Oregonian.

On March 22, that newspaper published an article which, in the judgment of Mr. Barnes, and in mine, too, contained numerous inaccuracies. The article questioned whether the several Government agencies involved in assuring that small business receives a fair share of Federal timber were dedicated to carrying out the spirit and intent of the law as enacted by the Congress. The Oregonian article made a very serious charge when it said, in effect, that the agencies who administer Government timber and the Small Business Administration do not want to administer the law.

I ask unanimous consent that Administrator Barnes' excellent letter of April 3 and the Oregonian newspaper story of March 22, which prompted the Barnes letter, be made a part of the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I would only add this point: The Small Business Administration, in my judgment, is proceeding both carefully and wisely to apply to the sale of Government timber the same principles which have been so helpful over the last few years to small businesses engaged in selling their products to the Government.

There is no great mystery nor any need for confusion in the timber set-aside program. It can be well carried out, in my judgment, if the agencies involved make the proper adjustments necessary to recognize the peculiar problems of each agency. In my opinion, a number of people who really are speaking for big business have been attempting to cloud the issue on timber set-asides. It is their desire that the small businessman be forced to close down. If we close the door to the small businessman, whether it be in the timber industry or the automobile industry, not only will the American people suffer, but the entire concept of the free enterprise system will be in jeopardy.

For my own part, I intend to do all that I can to help maintain the small businessman. I am delighted that Administrator Barnes is also proceeding with this particular job in accordance with the law and in a reasonable and effective manner.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., April 3, 1959.

Mr. JOHN L. DENNY,
Business Editor, the Oregonian,
Portland, Oreg.

DEAR MR. DENNY: An article under your byline, entitled "Morse Plan Seeks To Reserve Timber Sales for Small Firms," which appeared in the Oregonian on March 22, 1959, has been brought to my attention.

Like all other newspapers in the United States, I am sure the Oregonian is interested in reporting facts, and that it only prints factual data as submitted to it. Apparently the source of your information for the above-mentioned article either deliberately or through error, gave you some completely inaccurate information concerning the Small Business Administration. I should like to point out these inaccuracies in your article.

First, you say that "right now nobody seems to want it [the Morse amendment]—not the agencies who administer Government timber, the Small Business Administration, or the forest industries, big and small." We believe that small companies are entitled to a fair share of the timber disposed of by the Federal Government.

Second, you say that "confusion was compounded when the Small Business Administration set out to determine what is 'small business.' At first, it was proposed that limits be placed at firms with 10 to 20 employees. This was boosted to 250 employees and a regulation issued to that effect. Later this was changed to 100 employees, where it now stands." This statement is completely inaccurate and misleading. The Small Business Administration never suggested a limitation of "10 to 20 employees." Furthermore, we did not issue a regulation defining small business in this industry as one employing 250 or less employees. We published a proposed regulation in the Federal Register, utilizing a figure of 250 employees as being the proposed line of demarcation between large and small business, and requested comments. We also submitted this proposed regulation for comment to timber associations, timber operators, Members of Congress, the Forestry Service, and the Interior Department. A majority of the comments received indicated that our proposed figure of 250 employees was too high and that a figure of 100 employees would be more realistic. This figure of 100 employees was adopted with the concurrence of the Forestry Service. There has been no "confusion" in connection with this program; we do not intend to "hire a police force" to enforce the operation of this program, and we do not intend to "attempt to control the market for set-aside logs with price-ceiling regulations."

We have proceeded in an orderly manner to implement this amendment to our act. All of our actions have been fully coordinated with the Forestry Service and the Interior Department. Our set-aside program is not unilateral. Any set-aside initiated by SBA must be concurred in by the Forestry Service or the Interior Department, as the case may be. I know of no actions taken to date which would produce the dire results predicted in your article.

In all fairness, I think your paper should give the same credence to this letter as you gave to the person or persons who supplied the information for your article, and that you should give this program a chance to operate before passing judgment.

Sincerely yours,

WENDELL B. BARNES, Administrator.

MORSE PLAN SEEKS TO RESERVE TIMBER SALES FOR SMALL FIRMS

(By John L. Denny)

The public forests and forest industries of the Pacific Northwest will be the guinea pigs in a new attempt to regulate the economic laws of supply and demand.

This one will be a program to reserve a portion of Government timber for sale to small business operators, as required under the so-called Morse amendment to the Small Business Act.

It's scheduled to get its first trial not long after a March 27 meeting here of representatives of the three agencies involved—the Small Business Administration, the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management.

PLAN NOT LIKED

Right now, nobody seems to want it—not the agencies who administer Government timber, the SBA or the forest industries, big and small.

Leonard B. Netzorg, whose Western Forest Industries Association is considered the spokesman for the "small" timber operator, expressed his opposition this way:

"We have a philosophical queasiness about adding one more agency with authority to decide who can stay in business."

It has been marked by controversy, complications and confusion from the start, when Senator WAYNE MORSE introduced the set-aside provision as a floor amendment to the Small Business Act of 1958. Netzorg's group opposed it, but Senator MORSE, attributing the opposition to the wrong organization, fired a blast at W. D. Hagenstein of the Industrial Forestry Association, which is regarded as spokesman for "big" timber interests.

The IFA, mindful of the sacred cow nature of small business and which has firms of all sizes among its membership, has taken no public position on the matter.

Confusion was compounded when the SBA set out to determine what is small business. At first it was proposed that limits be placed at firms with 10 to 20 employees. This was boosted to 250 employees, and a regulation issued to that effect. Later this was changed to 100 employees, where it now stands.

Another and still unresolved question is: How much timber should be reserved and set aside for purchase by small business? Shall the amount of the set-aside be determined on a historical basis? What area should be used—the entire region, a forest, a working circle?

SALES SHARE EYED

It has been brought out that if a moving average "historical basis" is used to determine how much timber should be set aside for small business, then the set-asides will grow progressively larger. Small timber operators have been and probably will continue to buy timber at Government sales and purchases at regular sales plus those at the set-aside sales would increase any base figures used to determine the small business share.

The SBA would have to hire a forest police force to enforce one regulation the agency had proposed to include in the set-aside program. This was an attempt to regulate customers of small operators, by requiring that logs cut by small business buyers could be sold only to small business manufacturers. But the SBA apparently has given up on this one, after it was pointed out set-aside timber buyers would have no market for their pulp logs. There are no small business pulp and paper operators.

COMPETITORS VIEWED

Some industry members believe that the set-aside plan, in its practical application, will be of little benefit to small mill operators. They believe independent loggers will bid in most of the timber at the small business sales, and proceed to cut the timber and sell the logs for the best price they can get. In most cases the high bidder won't be a small mill operator. He can't compete with the larger integrated operator who has a barker, chipper, sawmill and veneer plant, and can afford to pay more for his logs because of higher utilization.

The SBA could, of course, attempt to control the market for set-aside logs with price ceiling regulations.

If the program succeeds in diverting a substantial volume of Government timber into small lumber mills, it will deal a serious setback to forest utilization and to the economy of the State, in the view of David Mason, widely known consulting forester.

Mason ticked off a dozen adverse effects of the program. It would, he said, reduce employment, because small mills employ fewer workers per 1,000 feet of logs processed than do larger, more integrated operations.

Reducing competition for Government timber, Mason pointed out, will reduce income of Oregon counties, who share in the receipts of Forest Service and O. & C. timber sales.

It will work against intensive utilization of timber, he said, since most smaller mills can't afford the investment in a barker and chipper.

The Morse amendment, Mason declared, can be called a law against a favorable business climate in Oregon, against sustained yield management of private timberland, and against the slow cutting of timber.

Other industry members viewed the program of giving limited utilization small operators exclusive purchase rights on Government timber as being the same as subsidizing submarginal agriculture.

ARE THE PUBLIC LANDS REALLY PUBLIC?

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the U.S. Government has continued in public ownership two substantial land holdings for use and enjoyment of our people—the 470 million acres of public lands under the Bureau of Land Management in the Department of the Interior and the 188 million acres of national forest lands in the Department of Agriculture.

Federal officials charged with administering these lands call these areas multiple-use lands where wood production, water development, grazing, mining, hunting, fishing, and other outdoor recreation can go on side by side. But, Mr. President, full, complete multiple use is not now possible. Use by the public and management by the Government require ready and proper access to these lands. The problem of providing access to national forests and other publicly owned tracts is especially acute in Western States where a checkerboard pattern of land ownership intermingles private and Federal holdings. Today the Federal Government is not the master of all its domain. Private interests sometimes completely bar the public from these lands. In other cases private interests dictate the terms and conditions under which the general public can go on to Federal lands. In some cases private interests may retard development of these Federal lands.

The Department of Agriculture's Forest Service has applied its authorities so as to grant ingress and egress to Federal land to an adjacent private land owner despite the fact that this party refuses the Government the reciprocal right to reach its own land. Under such policy the Government lacks the right to insure that the public can get to its own resources—or that the Government can properly develop these resources for the people.

NO ACCESS MEANS NO TIMBER SALES

A recent staff study of national forest timber sales by the Senate Interior Committee showed that in the States of Oregon and Washington over 1 billion board-feet of planned timber sales were delayed or unmade in a recent period due to lack of access—lack of rights-of-way. There are many additional billions of board-feet of timber thus tied up.

Millions of dollars of revenue have been lost to the Government—opportunities for timber cutting and real multiple-use development are stalled by a lack of access.

In many other areas, according to a separate report by the Oregon State Game Commission, thousands of acres of national forests are locked up by timber and grazing interests from the hunter and fisherman.

On the Upper Deschutes River, national forest lands are barred by roads closed on private lands. On the Wallowa-Whitman Forest one landowner is actually reported to charge a fee for access to 9,500 acres of federally owned national forest.

On the lands administered by the Bureau of Land Management, a somewhat similar situation exists. Deer and grouse hunting areas, fishing streams and lakes on Federal land are barred to the sportsmen. In the Steens Mountain area, 236,800 acres of Bureau of Land Management lands are reported closed by private interests. On the O. & C. lands, logging goes forward while public access for sportsmen is often barred.

NO KING'S LANDS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. President, in England the people were barred from enjoying or using the King's forest. Here we have the reverse developing, some of the national forest and range is barred to the people—not by the Government but by a few of the people who live around the forest and range.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], chairman of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, has told me that he is concerned by the factual information revealed by preliminary studies in Oregon and Colorado.

He is in agreement with my request that there should be a staff study made to reveal the full dimensions of the problem. We need to know how many acres of Federal land are blocked from reasonable access. I am sure that all true conservationists, whether they be stockmen, timbermen, hunters, fishermen, or campers will be pleased to know that this problem is going to receive attention.

I should like to emphasize, so that this subject is kept in perspective, that the best unofficial estimate of Federal lands where access is not available is that the total may approximate the 14 million in national forest wilderness acres. This is an intriguing observation. The most vocal opposition to the wilderness bill has come from timber and grazing people. It will indeed be interesting to see whether some of those who have been most vocal against a wilderness bill are among those who are trying to make private reserves out of public forest and range.

SPORTSMEN MUST HEED PRIVATE RIGHTS

I do want to have it fully understood by all concerned that the problem which confronts us has two sides. The conduct of hunters, fishermen, and campers has not always been above reproach. On occasions, thoughtless persons have cut private fences, shot livestock, damaged water supplies, and started forest fires. These actions have often motivated public land livestock permittees to close their own lands and in the process to seal off valuable public lands.

Similarly, some interests have often felt that the less public use of nearby national forests, the less would be the chance of catastrophic forest fires. They have sealed off public lands along with their own.

On the other hand, many, many private owners whose lands abut public forest and range have opened not only their lands but have helped to open public land for full use and enjoyment.

The right to control trespass is basic to the concept of private land ownership. It is a right which is free from governmental interference, except through due process of law. Our review of access problems will respect this right. However, when private land ownership benefits by values derived from its adjacency to public lands, then arrangements are justified for reciprocal access. Because of the ever-increasing pressure to use public lands, we cannot permit vast areas to remain as islands of inaccessibility.

In the consideration of the basic problem I am sure the committee staff will recognize all of these factors. As a Senator with a deep interest in this problem I can assure both those who wish our forest and range open, as well as those who have been keeping parts of public land closed, that I—and I am sure the other members of the committee—will proceed carefully and judiciously.

PUBLIC LANDS MUST NOT BE BARRICADED

The first thing before us is to obtain the factual situation, and I am assured that this work will proceed rapidly. It must be determined whether existing laws provide Federal agencies with adequate means of assuring access, whether this authority is fully utilized, and whether additional congressional action is advisable.

Needless locking up of public lands by private parties who have land adjacent to our public forest and range must not be permitted. Congress recently took action to stop excessive military public land withdrawal. It is my hope that the way in which this problem was approached will be the model used for our study of this matter.

Congressional consideration of this problem will be of material assistance to the National Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission where we are about to start a detailed inquiry into recreational needs. Outdoor recreation on public lands requires that the lands be open. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] has advised me that particular attention will be given to assisting the Commission in evaluating the amount of recreational use and values that may be involved.

Finally I would say the constructive suggestion of all interested groups will be welcomed by the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee so that we may obtain the benefit of well-considered views on reasonable and fair solutions.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed with my remarks an article entitled: "The Problem of Access to Public Lands," which was published in the January 15, 1959, issue of Conservation News of the National Wildlife Federation; and a report from the bulletin of the Wildlife Management Institute of January 16, 1959, entitled "Free Access to Public Lands Blocked."

There being no objection, the article and report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PROBLEM OF ACCESS TO PUBLIC LANDS

Something of a furor was raised in central Oregon this past fall over advertised plans of a group of ranchers to permit deer hunting on a fee basis over some 1 million acres of land. Many sportsmen's groups and the Oregon Game Commission went on record in opposition to the system, partly because it failed to recognize the right of all citizens to share equally in utilization of the State's wildlife resources and, in addition, because some public lands in Federal ownership were interspersed among the privately owned territory being advertised for fee hunting.

Reports indicate the fee-hunting plan was something less than a spectacular financial success, yet the incident does serve to point up a major problem—right of the public to enjoy access to, and use of, public lands for lawful recreational purposes.

The situation, largely concentrated in the 11 Western States but applicable to some degree all over the Nation, perhaps is best illustrated in Colorado. A survey just completed by the game and fish department and submitted to a State legislature interim committee reveals that 1½ million acres of public land in Colorado is controlled by private interests: farmers and ranchers, lumbering and mining companies, resorts and even municipalities. Members of the public can reach this land only by going across private property (sometimes for a fee, sometimes free, sometimes access is totally denied) or by detouring around at a considerable distance. Some Federal property is completely encircled by private holdings.

The final report covered 149 separate areas in 28 Colorado counties. The total public acreage controlled by private groups came to 1,462,738 acres or 12.7 percent of the total public land area in the counties surveyed. From another angle, the study involved 10,788,402 acres, or 78.7 percent of Colorado's national forests. Of this total, 80 percent (8,695,357 acres) was considered to provide good hunting and/or fishing. There were 120 separate areas where the public was denied access to 1,038,190 national forest acres, or 12.1 percent of the total.

Public land access problems in Colorado are applicable, to a considerable extent, throughout the West.

In all, the Federal Government has some 406 million acres of land exclusive of extensive holdings in Alaska. This huge area is broken down for administration into: National forests, 161 million acres; national parks and monuments, 17 million acres; national wildlife refuges, 10 million acres; military reservations, 25 million acres; and public domain, including grazing districts, 193 million acres. National forests, administered by the U.S. Forest Service, Department of Agriculture, are dedicated to multiple use, including recreations such as hunting and fishing. National parks, administered by the National Park Service, Department of the Interior, are dedicated to recreational and educational use, except hunting. National refuges, administered by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, Interior Department, are dedicated to the preservation of wildlife and some provide recreational possibilities, including hunting and fishing. Military reservations are administered by the Department of Defense and offer limited public recreational opportunities, including hunting and fishing, depending upon the type of basic activity and national security. Public domain, administered by the Bureau of Land Management, Interior Department, comprises the Federal properties which were left after the other lands were withdrawn for special uses.

The public access problem primarily concerns national forests and public domain lands. Each type of land has its own particular problems.

Speaking in generalities, many national forests are located in scenic but rugged mountain territory. Public domain lands constitute desert lands, plateaus, mountains, and odds and ends of Federal real estate, including huge tracts in Alaska.

Public domain property perhaps offers the most acute access problems. Whereas national forests were usually withdrawn or purchased in blocks, they are somewhat more easily administered than the public domain properties which often are widely scattered among more valuable land which was homesteaded, mined or claimed for other purposes. Many public domain lands are rocky outcroppings, canyons and gulches or other unwatered areas of little or no value.

Access to public domain land and national forests is a thorny problem. The areas are so widely scattered and isolated that it is uneconomical to mark boundaries or to fence the properties. Even though State wildlife agencies are providing access to some areas, all cannot be opened in this manner. The Federal agencies understandably are reluctant to resort to condemnation procedures to insure public access to public property but this approach may, in the final determination, offer the only possibility. The Federal Range Code prohibits interference with licensed hunters or fishermen to enter, and to hunt and fish on the Federal range covered by such license or permit but many access roads are on private lands.

Admittedly, hunters and fishermen sometimes create damage and dismay for private landowners, but there also is another side to the coin. Denying entry prevents application of good wildlife management practices. It does not allow for proper harvest of such big game animals as deer and elk. When these animals come down to lowlands during the winter, they damage both public and private lands and, by their excessive numbers, create added problems.

Another problem resulting from denied access is one common to all posted property. Whenever hunting and fishing areas are withdrawn from use, greater and greater demands are made upon those still open. In some parts of the West the hunting and fishing pressures for certain forms of wildlife are not so great that, if scattered equally over larger areas, they would be harmful. The concentration problem, however, becomes more acute each time another area is blocked out from proper use.

As an expanding population gains more and more leisure time, increased demands will be made for recreational areas as well as for livestock. Problems of conflict over use of public lands are bound to result. Perhaps the time has come for a reappraisal of public benefits to be derived from public lands and the administration of these properties. Such a reappraisal may reveal the need for basic land-use law revisions.

FREE ACCESS TO PUBLIC LANDS BLOCKED

Nearly 10 percent of the public lands in Colorado is unavailable to hunters, fishermen, and other recreationists, according to the Wildlife Management Institute.

A State fish and game department report being studied by a special committee of the Colorado Legislature shows that persons wishing to recreate on about 1½ million acres of public lands in 28 counties either are denied access or must pay a fee before crossing the intervening private holdings. Entry to the huge acreage is blocked by 233 farmers, ranchers, municipalities, and mining and timber groups.

The report is complete in detail. It names those who deny access and gives the location of the contested public lands and the acreages involved. It is evident that sportsmen are being deprived of access to some of the State's best hunting and fishing areas. What's more startling, of course, is the revelation that the public is being refused and, in some cases, actually is being forced to pay a fee in order to use its own property.

The Colorado report undoubtedly will stimulate similar inquiries in other western public land States. National forests and public domain lands provide unparalleled big game hunting opportunity in the West, and sportsmen will want to make sure that unnatural restrictions do not hamper their historic use of those lands. The main philosophy of the Colorado report is not to force access to public lands but rather to point out the magnitude of the problem and to provide a factual basis for its equitable solution.

The report has another interesting aspect. Some of those who block hunting access have, over the years, submitted one or more claims to the game department for payment for loss of hay to deer and elk. Although sportsmen are not given the opportunity to harvest the big game, the Department is expected to pay damages caused by the overabundant animals. Some of the claims have amounted to $4,500. They are being paid with money taken from the hunters' license fees.

CHRISTIAN A. HERTER, SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the unanimous approval by the Senate today of the nomination of Mr. Herter to be Secretary of State bespeaks the confidence of this body in Christian Herter.

I know it is a confidence which is shared by the Nation.

I am glad I had the opportunity to vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Herter. My confidence in Christian Herter is solidly based on his long experience in national and international affairs, on his courage, on his good judgment, and on his fine qualities of mind and heart.

I am sure also that the approval which has been given today will be more than justified by the actions of Mr. Herter in his new position of Secretary of State, and that he will, in the new opportunity afforded him render the same great service and show the same devotion to our country he has heretofore demonstrated.

ADJOURNMENT TO 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, pursuant to the order previously entered, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 28 minutes p.m.), in accordance with the order previously entered, the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 22, 1959, at 11 o'clock a.m.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate April 21, 1959:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Christian A. Herter, of Massachusetts, to be Secretary of State.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Today's Challenge, and How To Meet It

OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on April 17, 1959, there was a speech given by the Honorable Arthur E. Summerfield, Postmaster General of the United States, before the Los Angeles Merchants and Manufacturers Association dinner, entitled "Today's Challenge, and How To Meet It."

Mr. Summerfield, in this speech highlights the Communist threat to our national safety and our battle against inflation. It was an outstanding address and deserves to be called to the attention of every Member of the Congress and every citizen of our country; therefore I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY'S CHALLENGE, AND HOW TO MEET IT

(Address by Hon. Arthur E. Summerfield, Postmaster General of the United States, before the annual dinner of the Los Angeles Merchants and Manufacturers Association, Los Angeles, Calif., April 17, 1959)

It is always a great pleasure for me to be in Los Angeles.

I am always inspired by the vitality of this great city—and, indeed, of all California and the Pacific coast.

All my life, I have thrilled to the story of the winning of the West.

It is one of the great adventures of all mankind—the westward sweep of the pioneers, the gold rush, the pony express, the constant blazing of new frontiers.

I stand in awe of the courage and strength and faith of the Americans who lived this tremendous story.

Nothing could stop them from gaining the better life they saw for themselves and their children.

They left a magnificent heritage for you—for all Americans—to ponder and to uphold.

California today is a monument to their vision.

You are on the way to becoming our most populous State.

You have assumed great responsibility in economic and political leadership.

You face opportunities that are virtually unlimited in scope.

But this you also know—that the very essence of real opportunity is challenge.

And because the meeting of today's challenge is so fundamental to the progress you would make—so basic to the ends we must achieve as a nation—I am deeply anxious to talk with you about it.

I want to bring to you, tonight, a clear picture of the urgent nature of the challenge we face, and how we can meet it.

I want to speak to you—not only as your Postmaster General, but as a member of President Eisenhower's Cabinet and a member of the President's Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth.

I come with firsthand knowledge of the problems facing our Nation, and the steps your Government is taking to solve them.

But I come with more than a report.

My purpose, above all, is to talk with you about action.

For, my friends, we are at an extremely crucial stage in the progress of America.

We have a choice of paths to follow.

We have momentous decisions to make.

The ultimate responsibility for these decisions is with the American people.

And I am confident that, if the people apply their real genius, and determination, and devotion—the final decisions will be the right decisions.

There are four specific problems I should like to discuss—and then, if I may, I should like to suggest the vital part you can play in meeting each of them.

They are:

1. The Communist threat to our national safety.

2. Our battle against inflation.

3. The destructive monopoly power of a group of union leaders.

4. The urgent necessity for tax reform.

All of these, of course, are interrelated.

Our national defense depends upon a strong economy—and our economy is acutely responsive to what we do about inflation, about production costs and prices, and about taxation.

The Communist challenge is many sided.

It is military, political, spiritual and economic.

We and our allies have steadily rebuffed the military and political threats.

Wherever the Communists have probed, they have found us standing firm.

At Lebanon, in the China Sea, in the unity of our NATO alliance—and now in the Berlin issue—we have met the challenge with unmistakable evidence of the strength of our purpose.

We shall continue to keep our military power equal to any test.

Our overall might in planes, missiles, ships, and other equipment, must always be capable of deterring, and if ever necessary, defeating, any attack upon us.

We shall continue to meet the Soviet political challenge.

We shall lead the way in exploring every avenue of reasonable hope for justly solving the issues that divide the world.

In the battle of spiritual values, we cannot lose so long as we preserve the freedom and moral strength on which our way of life is built.

The Soviets know all this very well.

Why, then, are they confident of ultimate victory?

Because they are concentrating on all-out economic war—and they believe they can defeat us in such a war without risking their own total destruction.

They intend to become the world's one first-class economic power, forcing us into second-class status. And for us, such an outcome would be just as tragic as nuclear devastation.

Today we are well in front. But they believe we have not the system or the will to maintain our economic strength and growth.

They expect our economy to explode, while theirs continues to grow.

My friends, let me emphasize that we dare not look lightly on their great expectations.

For here we do indeed stand at the crossroads of decision.

The soundness of our economy is threatened by deadly forces that have wrecked other nations in the past.

They are the forces of inflation and onerous taxation—and we are not yet united as a people to overcome them.

I suggest to you that there is urgent reason for us to do so.

As Allen Dulles, Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said recently:

"If they, the Soviets, succeed and we fail, it will only be because of our complacency and because they have devoted a far greater share of their power, skill, and resources to our destruction than we have been willing to dedicate to our own preservation."

Let us look at some basic facts about inflation.

I am sure we all agree on what inflation is—and what it does.

Certainly we have had ample opportunity, over 20 years, to see it in action.

To most Americans, inflation means higher costs of living.

It means more and more struggle to try to make ends meet.

We have inflation when the cost of what we buy keeps rising while the value of the dollars we have to buy it with keeps dropping.

Since 1939, our cost of living has more than doubled.

The value of our dollar has dropped until the 100-cent dollar of 1939 is now worth just 48 cents.

How much lower would you say we dare to let it go?

Inflation feeds on the income and the savings of every individual, every enterprise, in America.

It eats away the savings we cherish for our family's security.

It robs us of the real value of the dollars we earn.

It destroys the will to work and the desire to save.

I suspect almost everyone in this room knows of someone whose savings, or insurance, or social security—carefully nurtured through half a lifetime—now is tragically inadequate to meet his needs.

As President Eisenhower has put it:

"Inflation is not a Robin Hood, taking from the rich to give to the poor. Rather, it deals most cruelly with those who can least protect themselves. It strikes hardest those millions of our citizens whose incomes do not quickly rise with the cost of living. When prices soar, the pensioner and the widow see their security undermined; the man of thrift sees his savings melt away; the white collar worker, the minister, and the teacher see their standards of living dragged down."

As businessmen and community leaders, you are only too well aware of what inflation brings in rising costs and stifling taxes.

And, finally, I would point out that the problem affects, in equal measure, the cost of maintaining the operations of your Government.

Now, what are we doing to meet this deadly force?

We are waging a battle, led by the President of the United States, which in the past year has succeeded in bringing the rise in the cost of living under control.

We are fighting to accomplish the stability of the dollar we must have to go forward soundly.

We are striving to continue our economic growth at the rate of which we are capable, with its expanding opportunity for every citizen.

But we are also facing tremendous pressures for a resumption of the inflationary process.

They are vast pressures for extravagant Government spending, and for a sharp new uptrend in the spiral of wages and prices.

Amazingly, the spending pressures are actually being led by some of the leaders of Congress—and of some State administrations.

They are practicing government by pressure group rather than government for the people.

And they will only be dissuaded by public opinion strong enough to impress its will upon them.

For this reason, it is vitally important for our people to understand some plain, straight facts.

Government, in our system, is constituted to serve the people. It must meet all the legitimate needs of its citizens.

It must do all it can for the good of the people, within the means the people are willing and able to provide.

But there are those in and out of Government who stoutly observe that we are a big nation of great wealth—and, therefore, we should put no limit to what we do in public projects—whether or not the people are able to pay the bills.

Nothing could be more crassly misleading—for the fact is, the people have no choice.

Who else will pay?

The Government has no wealth of its own. It is the agency of the people.

And when it spends more than it collects in taxes, every citizen has to pay the excess, in one way or another.

If it is not in higher taxes, then it is in suffering the inflation that deficit financing by any government inevitably brings.

Inflation itself is an invisible tax.

It is a tax without exemptions—a tax on the income of the poor in the same rate as on the incomes of the more well to do.

It is a severe tax on the savings of the thrifty.

It is, in the end, the highest and the cruelest tax of all.

If there is one thing that history has made frighteningly clear—it is that continued deficit financing by a government degrades the value of its money and spreads inflation ever further and deeper through the economy of its people. The ultimate result is collapse.

Great students of economics tell us the decline and fall of the Roman Empire was due principally to the confusion and upheaval of inflation.

We all know what happened when Germany accepted inflation as a national policy after World War I.

In 1923, 42 billion marks were required to buy 1 cent in American exchange.

Simple commodities of daily life cost trillions of marks—if you could get them at all.

And the way was open for a demagogue such as Adolf Hitler to lead that country into the tragedy of World War II.

These are but a few of the examples that stand out on the open book.

But they go unheeded by the many Members of Congress and the State administrations that are pushing vast spending schemes—schemes that far exceed the budgets available to pay for them.

More than 7,000 bills have been introduced in this session of the 86th Congress.

Only a small handful of these are major measures of broad national interest.

The vast majority would provide benefits of one kind or another to individuals or groups.

And in no case are new taxes proposed to offset them.

Their backers are encouraged by the fact that the majority of the present spending Congress is committed to Federal spending—and to deficit financing—as an economic policy.

Chairman BYRD of the Senate Finance Committee has noted, with alarm, that the effects of that policy already are plain.

The Senate, he reports, has voted to increase President Eisenhower's budget proposals by 24 percent, and the House has voted increases averaging 12 percent.

These increases represent billions of dollars.

Let us now discuss the third problem we face—the effect of the huge economic power exercised by union monopoly leaders.

This is a power that ranks among the highest accumulations of vested interest to be found in history.

It is a monopoly that draws upon huge financial resources—that permits a few perennial leaders to spend millions of dollars of dues money for political purposes, exactly as the leaders see fit, with no choice given the men and women who pay the dues.

It is a power capable of imposing at will an ever-rising cost of living upon our people.

There is no question but what the legitimate function of every labor leader is to ask for—to negotiate for—higher wages.

This is a rightful purpose of union leadership.

I myself worked at a factory job as a young man—and I know very well that one of my goals was higher wages.

I have always been, and will always be, in favor of a responsible union movement.

But union members, with all other Americans, have every reason to insist that their leaders, as well as the leaders in management, exercise a high order of statesmanship.

It is up to union leaders to recognize that if they use their monopoly power to force wage increases and employee benefits too high—they bring about fewer jobs and greater unemployment—and thereby miserably fail in their duty to their members.

By forcing wage increases which far outrun increases in productivity, labor leaders can set the spiral of wage-price inflation going again.

Once launched in the basic industries, the inflationary wave will sweep out through all manufacturing, transportation, distribution, every part of the economy.

Why do excessive wage costs have such powerful impact?

Because, after exclusion of all taxes, up to 83 percent of all income generated in the national economy goes to payment of labor.

For a $3,000 automobile, for example, the required steel costs about $290—and even this price at the steel mill, in turn, includes labor cost as its main component.

What this means is that an unearned rise in employment costs has four times as much inflationary effect as a corresponding rise in all the remaining costs of production put together.

With this in mind, let us note that 154 major wage contracts come up for negotiation this year—including the steel industry, with its nearly 1 million workers.

The cumulative effect of excessive wage-cost increases on this scale I leave to your imagination. There would be no way to describe it other than to call it a national calamity.

Everyone would suffer.

The blow, as we have noted, would fall hardest on the millions whose incomes have not gone up—the people on salaries, fixed incomes, and pensions.

But let no one assume that he would escape—least of all the wage earner himself.

He would soon find that the new-won increase had evaporated in higher living costs.

Worse, he could find that even his job is gone because the product he makes has been priced out of the market—no longer able to compete effectively at home or abroad.

And this, ladies and gentlemen, is no idle speculation.

The time when we were virtually the only country able to meet the great world demand for many types of finished goods is over.

The productive ability of most industrial nations is greater than ever before.

Competition is in full swing.

And today, we are seeing a rising number of American goods being priced out of the foreign markets.

The American producer, with his sharply increasing differential in wage costs, is simply unable to compete.

Nor is this a minor factor in our employment picture.

The estimate is that our export trade sustains four and one-half million jobs in America.

Let us ask this question of those who would continue to push excessive wage costs:

How many of these jobs—how many hundreds of thousands—how many millions—will be lost if we persist in making our goods so costly they have no chance to compete.

Indeed, let us ask another question:

How is it that foreign industries can make some of the products in which we are most efficient, ship those products thousands of miles to our own markets, and sell them at a price so low that we can no longer compete, even here at home.

Such is the growing situation in which our wage-cost inflation is placing us.

We are told, for example, that the Japanese have bought scrap metal here on the West Coast, carried it back to their mills, processed it into finished products, returned them back across the Pacific Ocean, and still undersold American producers by as much as $29 a ton.

We should, and do, look to the increasing of job opportunities here at home through the expansion of our production capacity.

We should take every step to encourage, not sap, the growth-power of industry and business.

But we can hardly say we are giving full encouragement if we permit wage-push inflation that deprives our industry of adequate earnings to plow back into new products, equipment, and plants.

Every thinking American, I believe, will agree that the decline has gone far enough when the ratio of profits to sales, after taxes, for all industry, drops from 7 percent in 1948 to 4.8 percent in 1958.

Especially is this true when we recognize the burden our taxation is placing on the accumulation of capital for investment.

It is the same burden being imposed on the personal incentive and earning power of every citizen.

The tax foundation tells us the average earner of $4,500 a year works 22 days each month.

Seven days of this total—nearly one-third of his working time—is taken from his income in taxes.

And as he may succeed in building his income, he can look forward to the tax chunk becoming larger.

We need to relieve this stifling tax load being carried by the individual citizen and by our business system.

Our great Nation has been built on the motivation of high levels of individual achievement.

We have encouraged, with material reward, each citizen to perform to the best of his capacity.

Even the Soviets have taken note of this advantage.

Russia, despite its Communist doctrine, now offers high incentives for outstanding individual performance in industry, science, and other areas of its society.

Consider, against this, the fact that we have been moving in the direction of destroying incentive.

Through taxation, we have steadily compressed the reward for doing something as opposed to doing little, or doing nothing.

Our population is growing rapidly.

Business can create new jobs to meet this growth only as billions of dollars are invested in new tools and capacity.

Now, where is this money to come from?

Today, Federal taxes alone can take more than half of many companies' net income.

Then follow State and local taxes.

There are over 100,000 taxing authorities in our country.

Their weight can literally crush the ability of business to meet its job-creating capital needs.

Our present tax structure is seriously outdated.

It is a set of laws reflecting largely the conditions of the past, especially World War II, when the goal was the confiscation of war profits, not the building of a sound peacetime economy.

A sensible, equitable, dynamic tax program is needed in its place.

Such a program will keep total revenues up, not by taxing away incentive and means of growth, but by steadily increasing the tax base.

These problems I have discussed this evening can be clearly stated.

But how clearly do we see the answers that can be given to them.

This is our task.

And I believe we cannot emphasize too heavily the answers that are being provided by our national leadership, and by leaders in many States.

These answers add up to a program of full employment with stable prices and tax reform—a program offering greater opportunity for every American.

It is because we have pursued such a program that our economy has bounded back from the recession to a dynamic new level.

The signposts are clearly visible and our program is well under way.

First of all, we have a sound and sensible philosophy of government.

We have adopted fiscal policies that are sound and productive and set realistic budgets.

We are meeting the full needs of our defense program.

We are meeting all the legitimate needs of our people.

We have refused to give away taxpayer money to nonessential projects, lavish spending schemes, and welfare state activities intended to curry favor with special groups rather than to meet the needs of all the people.

We are attempting to operate the Government on a pay-as-you-go basis, thereby avoiding the fatalistic deficit philosophy so easy to get into but so desperately hard to

We are encouraging a higher order of statesmanship in union-management wage negotiations.

We are bringing public opinion to bear so that union leaders consider the real welfare of their members and the Nation rather than striving to outdo each other in wringing inflationary wage packages from industry.

We want adequate laws to control abuses of union leader monopoly power.

Such laws were established for business, correctly and firmly, when some businessmen abused the public trust in years past.

We want to give union members their rights to pass on the action of their leaders and the use of their dues.

And finally, we intend to push forward as rapidly as we can to achieve a progressive tax program.

I believe that heartening progress is being made in all these areas.

The sound fiscal program of the President with his insistence upon balancing the budget, is rapidly gaining wide support.

We are giving utmost attention to the development of aggressive programs to help prevent the resurgence of inflation, with its higher costs of living.

Toward this end, the work of the Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth is under way.

The committee, as you know, is headed by one of California's great sons, who is serving our Nation so ably—Vice President RICHARD NIXON.

I am proud to be a member of this group.

In the wage-price area, we can only hope that the statesmanship we so urgently desire will be forthcoming.

It is not immediately apparent in the announced intentions of demands we have seen.

It is clear that union members themselves want responsible union leadership—responsible to their welfare, and to the national welfare.

With the great majority of the public at large, they want laws that will help to assure responsible leadership.

In regard to taxation, we are working to carry forward a program of tax reform and reduction.

The President's stress on a balanced budget is related directly to this goal.

Steps in the right direction already have been taken with the Revenue Act of 1954.

The time is approaching for another bold and imaginative breakthrough on tax policy that will benefit and encourage all taxpayers—large and small.

Obviously, this program cannot call for immediate and sharp reduction in all income tax rates.

It calls for gradual reform.

And it calls for equitable reduction for all taxpayers.

Its goal includes corresponding cuts in capital gains, estate, gift and excise taxes.

It provides for job-creating reductions of business tax rates—and realistic depreciation provisions.

In short, the objective must be a completely organized and integrated tax program that will meet the real needs of our entire economy.

The public, more and more, is rallying behind the President, who is fighting to maintain a balanced budget, to achieve tax reform, and to bring under control the extravagances and excesses that feed inflation.

But let me not overstate this premise.

The battle is far from won.

The special interests bent on spending, taxing, and deficit financing still are riding high—still have the ears of the majority of our Federal legislators and State administrations.

Washington is swarming with representatives of the special interest groups.

Each is concerned with favoring legislation for his pet project.

The fight for fiscal sanity is being waged by the President, members of his administration, and some Members of the Congress.

It is this group, almost alone, that is bearing the brunt of the battle.

The leftwing economists, the welfare-State plotters, the racketeering union bosses, and their minions of do-gooders and political captives are using every kind of vicious attack to break this firm stand.

Washington is the ground from which they launch their tirades, and their slogans claiming "neglect of the jobless," "favoritism to big business," "inadequate defenses," "obsession with the budget," and the like.

They are making an all-out attack on the free-enterprise system, and they have many camp followers in the legislative halls—some deliberately—others without knowing the effects of their misguided efforts.

My appeal to you tonight, and to the American people, is to join this battle to meet this challenge.

Remember that, in the struggle with Russia, we are strong militarily—we are strong politically—we are strong spiritually.

We must continue to strengthen ourselves economically.

We can no more appease inflation than we can appease Soviet aggression.

I believe we shall continue to build the strongest, freest way of life the world will know.

But I also believe that, to do so, America must maintain a sound economic philosophy, and sound policies firmly based on that philosophy.

We must never accept the premise that our basic problems cannot be solved.

Inflation, deficits, high costs of living, and oppressive taxation all are manmade.

So, too, is the destructive monopoly power of union leaders.

There is nothing sacred about them.

By attacking these problems with intelligence, determination, and perseverance, we shall overcome them.

May there be a reassertion—by all of us—of the courage and strength and faith of the Americans who opened the great West.

I am confident that the business and community leadership of the west coast, which is so well represented here tonight, will play a vital part in keeping our free enterprise system strong.

As civic leaders in a key city and State, your views and actions are vitally important—to your own progress, to your State, and to the Nation.

This is why I am deeply impressed by the emphasis your association places on employee communications.

Employees want information on which to base their decisions.

And they want fair and honest information.

I have always felt that businessmen should provide their employees with the facts about the issues that affect the ability of the business to compete, to advance, and to grow.

For these are the factors that determine the rewards and the opportunities for the employees themselves.

Perhaps too many businessmen are failing to meet this responsibility, to the detriment of their employees, their stockholders, as well as themselves.

I would ask you to give this your deepest thought.

Are businesmen and civic leaders doing enough to help provide the facts to everyone associated with them—employees, stockholders, community neighbors, and voting citizens.

Is any competition more important than the competition to determine how soundly this Nation is to conduct its economic affairs.

Is any problem more important.

I would dare to suggest that you assess what you are doing individually.

If you believe that we must attack the causes of inflation and onerous taxation firmly and intelligently—if you believe union monopoly power must be curbed—ask yourself if you are doing all you can to support that belief.

Your belief in America can be effective only as you let it be known.

I urge you to take your place among those who will speak, work, and fight for sound policies and a stronger America in the years before us.

There is nothing more important to you, your family, your future, and your Nation than that you take your stand now.

Speak up—let your representatives in Congress know what you think.

Let them know you understand that a Government big enough to do everything for its citizens from cradle to grave is also big enough to take everything from them in taxes.

Every businessman must understand that the political party of his choice is what he makes it—either by his participation or lack of participation in its affairs and in its choice of candidates.

Unless responsible citizens, especially business leaders, devote more of their time and effort and organizing ability—as well as their money—to unselfish politics, directed to the greatest common good, government by pressure groups will continue to grow.

Only by universal participation can we be sure that the Government will serve all the people—not some special interest—and assure the greatest opportunities for all our citizens.

My friends—this is the banner of true liberalism.

Advancing under it, we shall meet the Communist economic challenge as surely as we shall meet the military and political challenge.

We shall constantly move forward into the golden era of unlimited opportunity that lies ahead.

We shall preserve the great free and growing economy which is the foundation of all our freedoms—our security—our prosperity—and our future, in a strong, free, and better world.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22, 1959

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers, grateful for our heritage of freedom, we acknowledge the clear vision of our God-fearing forefathers who, when they had broken the unjust chains of tyranny, refused to accept the coercive reins of even a benevolent government, but who set the rights of all the people above the powers of governors and made them but the servants of freemen.

As soldiers of the common good deliver us from any thought or action which is treason against the freedom wrought for us by those who kneeled around the cradle of our state.

Give truth to our words, sincerity to our hearts, and courage to our deeds in these times that are testing, as by fire, the treasure bequeathed to us.

So may we in our day make patriotism beautiful with loyalty and dedication to this free land of our love and prayer. Amen.

A resolution of the Senate of the State of Washington; to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy:

"Whereas Congress, at the request of the Department of Defense, has authorized the construction of a new nuclear reactor for the production of plutonium at the Hanford atomic products operation; and

"Whereas such a reactor generates a tremendous amount of energy which, in previous reactor designs, has been wasted as heat dissipated in the Columbia River; and

"Whereas this waste energy can be converted to usable electricity; and

"Whereas Congress has authorized design and engineering studies for making this new reactor eventually convertible to the production of electricity as a byproduct, but has not provided for the inclusion of these features in the construction of the reactor at the present time; and

"Whereas the immediate future will bring a need for more electrical power in the Northwest; and

"Whereas the Hanford operation itself consumes some 300,000 kilowatts of power from our Northwest power pool; and

"Whereas by the addition of these dual purpose facilities this new reactor could produce up to 700,000 kilowatts of firm power, thereby enabling the Hanford plant not only to release for domestic and industrial purposes the power it now consumes from our local sources, but enabling it also to add almost the equivalent of another Bonneville Dam to the Northwest power pool; and

"Whereas the inclusion of the convertible features in the initial stage of the reactor would save more than $10 million: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the senate does hereby respectfully request Congress to make provision now for the inclusion of the convertible features during the initial construction of the new atomic reactor at Hanford; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the U.S. Senate, to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, and to every member of the congressional delegation of the State of Washington.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 51

"Concurrent resolution preserving for posterity the definition of Aloha given at Kawaiahao Church on the 13th day of March 1959, during services of thanksgiving for the granting of statehood to Hawaii

"Whereas the achievement of the long sought goal of statehood for Hawaii was brought to pass on the 12th day of March in the year 1959 by the memorable action of the 86th Congress of the United States of America which granted to Hawaii the right to be admitted to the Union on an equal footing with the other 49 members of the constellation of States; and

"Whereas on the following day citizens of Hawaii from all walks of life and from all races and religions gathered together for a service of thanksgiving and spiritual rededication to our one Nation, under God, indivisible, at historic Kawaiahao Church in Honolulu; and

"Whereas at that service of thanksgiving within those hallowed walls where so much of Hawaii's history, both temporal and spiritual, has been unfolded, the Reverend Dr. Abraham Kahikina Akaka, pastor of Kawaiahao Church, delivered an inspiring explanation of the spirit of Aloha which will serve as a source of inspiration to unborn generations of the State of Hawaii: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 30th Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, the Senate concurring, That the following words of the Reverend Akaka defining Aloha which were delivered on the 13th day of March in the year 1959 at historic Kawaiahao Church during services of thanksgiving for the achievement of statehood for Hawaii be and hereby are preserved for posterity:

" 'We do not understand the meaning of Aloha until we realize its foundation in the power of God at work in the world. Since the coming of our missionaries in 1820, the name for God to our people has been Aloha. One of the first sentences I learned from my mother in my childhood was this from Holy Scripture: "Aloha ke akua." In other words, Aloha is God, Aloha is the power of God seeking to unite what is separated in the world—the power that unites heart with heart, soul with soul, life with life, culture with culture, race with race, nation with nation. It is the power that can reunite where quarrel has brought separation; it is the power that reunites a man with himself when he has become separated from the image of God within.

" 'Thus when a people or a person live in the spirit of Aloha, they live in the spirit of God. And among such a people whose lives so affirm their inner being, we see the working of the Scripture: "All things work together for good to them who love God. * * * From the Aloha of God came his Son that we might have life and that we might have it more abundantly."

" 'Aloha consists of a new attitude of heart, above negativism and legalism. It is the unconditional desire to promote the true good of other people in a friendly spirit, out of a sense of kinship. Aloha seeks to do good to a person, with no conditions attached. We do not do good only to those who do good to us. One of the sweetest things about the love and Aloha of God is that it welcomes the stranger and seeks his good. A person who has the spirit of Aloha loves even when the love is not returned. And such is the love of God.

" 'This is the meaning of Aloha. I feel especially grateful that the discovery and development of our islands long ago was not couched in the context of an imperialistic and exploitive national power, but in the context of Aloha. There is a very deep correlation between the charter under which the missionaries came—namely, "to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ, to cover these islands with productive green fields, and to lift the people to a high state of civilization"—correlation between this fact, and the fact that Hawaii is not one of the trouble spots in the world today. Aloha does not exploit a people and keep them in ignorance and subservience. Rather it shares the sorrows and joys of people; it seeks to promote the true good of others.

" 'Today, one of the deepest needs of mankind is the need to feel a sense of kinship one with another. Truly all mankind belongs together, for from the very beginning—all mankind has been called into being, nourished, watched over by the love of God who is Aloha. The real Golden Rule is Aloha. This is the way of life we must affirm.

" 'Let us affirm ever what we really are—for Aloha is the spirit of God at work in you and in me and in the world, uniting what is separated, overcoming darkness and death, bringing new light and life to all who sit in the darkness of fear and the shadow of death, guiding the feet of mankind into the way of peace.

" 'Thus may our becoming a State mean to our Nation and world, and may it reaffirm that which was planted in us 139 years ago on this ground: "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people" '; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this concurrent resolution be delivered to the Reverend Dr. Abraham Kahikina Akaka, to the Public Archives of the Territory, to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the U.S. Congress, to the National Archives and to the U.S. Information Agency.

RESOLUTIONS OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF RHODE ISLAND

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], I present, for appropriate reference, two resolutions adopted by the Rhode Island General Assembly at its January 1959 session.

The first resolution memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to provide for a regional national cemetery in the State of Rhode Island.

The second resolution memorializes the Congress and particularly the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in Congress, asking each to work for legislation increasing the minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 an hour.

There being no objection, the resolutions were received, appropriately referred and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"SENATE RESOLUTION 18

"Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to provide for a regional national cemetery in the State of Rhode Island

"Whereas many of the fallen heroes who have lost their lives in the defense of human rights and liberties have not been interred in national cemeteries because of the great distance to be travelled by their loved ones in visiting their resting places; and

"Whereas it is fitting that those who have made the supreme sacrifice be properly interred and recognized; and

"Whereas the need for establishing national cemeteries on a regional basis has now become apparent; and

"Whereas it is proper that such a cemetery be established in the State of Rhode Island, the early exponent of freedom in the New World, preferably in the George Washington Memorial Reservation in the town of Glocester: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States are earnestly requested to use their best efforts to cause the introduction and passage of legislation to have a national cemetery established in the State of Rhode Island for the interment of any veteran of any of the wars in which the United States has been or in the future may be engaged; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted forthwith by the secretary of state to each of the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States."

To the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"HOUSE RESOLUTION 1249

"Resolution memorializing Congress, and particularly the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in Congress, asking each to work for legislation increasing the minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 an hour

"Whereas in Washington there has been proposed by 3 Senators and 1 House Member an increase in the minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 an hour and extension of wage-hour law coverage to 7 million more workers were proposed by 3 Senators and 1 House Member; and

"Whereas the proposed legislation would repeal a 1949 amendment which restricted the coverage of the wage-hour laws to employees of producers of goods in interstate commerce and of others whose operations are closely related and directly essential to such production; and

"Whereas another proposal would extend the wage-hour coverage to several enterprises not now covered but still subject to the Board jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board; and

"Whereas a third proposal would eliminate certain exemptions from the wage-hour coverage, such as some local transportation and communication services, and specified retail establishments; and

"Whereas the sponsors said their legislation will be so written as to exempt explicitly the so-called ma and pa family-operated enterprises: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the members of the Rhode Island General Assembly now go on record as supporting such proposed legislation, requesting the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island to use their best efforts to have this proposal enacted into legislation; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state be and he is hereby authorized to transmit duly certified copies of this resolution to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States."

RESOLUTION OF HAWAIIAN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I am sure that few people were happier than the distinguished junior Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING] when Hawaii became the 50th State.

Hawaii is well aware that ERNEST GRUENING worked diligently and long for her interest. In token of this, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Hawaiian Territorial Legislature, which expresses the heartwarming appreciation of the islands for the service rendered in the cause of statehood by this great Senator and citizen.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and, under the rule, to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the hopes and aspirations of the people of Hawaii for equal rights and privileges with all other citizens of the United States have been realized by the passage of the bill admitting the State of Hawaii into the Union; and

Whereas it is particularly appropriate that special thanks be given to those members of the Congress of the United States whose patient and tireless personal efforts on behalf of the people of Hawaii brought about the eventual fulfillment of these hopes; Now therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 30th Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, That the special thanks and fondest Aloha of the people of Hawaii be and they are hereby given to Senator ERNEST GRUENING, of the great State of Alaska, for his patient, forceful and untiring efforts on their behalf to attain for them full and equal rights and privileges with all other citizens of the United States by the granting of statehood to Hawaii; and be it further

Resolved, That a duly certified copy of this resolution be sent forthwith to the Honorable ERNEST GRUENING.

AUTHORITY TO SELL CERTAIN WAR-BUILT VESSELS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to designate and sell up to eight C–4 type war-built vessels from the National Defense Reserve Fleet, for use in the expanding domestic trade with our newest State, Hawaii.

Senators will recall that during the 85th Congress our committee considered some 20 or more bills and resolutions to authorize the sale of war-built vessels to various countries or nationals thereof. Due to the depression in the maritime industry resulting from the general lessening of world trade and the overtonnaging of world trade routes by new vessel construction throughout the world, the pressure for purchase of the vessels lapsed, and the sales legislation was not pushed to enactment.

Following extended hearings on the sales proposals, however, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported out a bill that would have given the Secretary of Commerce, under certain definite restrictions, the authority to dispose of, or to scrap, certain of the reserve fleet vessels which the Defense Department no longer considered strategic.

In its report the committee stated "that the time was rapidly approaching when decision had to be made with regard to the disposition, or updating, of our rapidly deteriorating reserve fleet."

The arguments advanced in support of the bill now being introduced are, first, that additional cargo-carrying capacity of a special type is now needed to service adequately the growing trade between the west coast and Hawaii; and, second, that sale of these vessels for use in this unsubsidized domestic trade will result in the updating and modernizing of the vessels involved. This will, of course, redound to the national advantage, particularly should the vessels ever be needed for military purposes in an emergency.

Under the provisions of the bill, the purchaser of a vessel would be required to spend not less than $3 million to convert it into a container-type vessel, the work to be done in a shipyard of the United States.

This would create employment for the shipyards and their suppliers, provide seagoing jobs for additional seamen, and would render usable vessels that now are deteriorating from lack of use, and insure their maintenance in a continuous state of readiness for national defense purposes if needed.

An interesting method of disposal would be provided under the bill in that the Secretary of Commerce would be authorized to sell the vessels at public auction, for cash, to the highest bidder. An upset, or base, price would be set by the Secretary, below which no bids would be given consideration.

Public hearings will be held on the bill, at which the need for the vessels in the particular trade, the upset prices to be set, and all other provisions of the bill will be subject to closest scrutiny. In addition, the bill provides that the contract of sale covering each vessel would contain such additional conditions as the Secretary of Commerce deems necessary to protect the interest of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1769) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to sell certain war-built vessels, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON (by request), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

AMENDMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE ACT RELATING TO ELIGIBILITY OF CERTAIN CLINICS FOR FEDERAL AID

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend title VI of the Public Health Service Act, as amended, in order to make certain clinics in rural areas eligible for Federal aid to diagnostic or treatment centers.

I ask unanimous consent to have a statement explaining the bill incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1770) to amend title VI of the Public Health Service Act, as amended, in order to make certain clinics in rural areas eligible for Federal aid to diagnostic or treatment centers, introduced by Mr. COTTON, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The statement presented by Mr. COTTON is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR COTTON

Since 1946, the Federal Government has been authorized to carry some of the financial load for the construction of hospitals and other health facilities, under the Federal Hospital Survey and Construction Act, popularly known as the Hill-Burton Act.

The act is popular, beneficial, and generally successful. However, I believe it has a major weakness which should be corrected without further delay.

The provisions of the act discriminate, unintentionally but effectively, against rural areas of the country.

The 54 million Americans who live in the rural areas and small towns are entitled to as much consideration for their health requirements as those who live in the big cities. In fact, the rural communities often have a greater shortage of health facilities, and need more help in securing them.

Federal assistance for hospital construction can be given only if the facilities are administered by a public authority, such as a State, city, or town, or if the facilities are owned and operated by a nonprofit private association or corporation, like a hospital. These restrictions have greatly hampered attempts to construct much needed diagnostic and treatment clinics in rural areas because (1) rural communities are often at the full limit of their public debt ceilings and cannot advance the money necessary for such clinics, and (2) private nonprofit associations and corporations are unwilling to accept complete ownership and operation of rural clinics, because of the considerable financial and legal responsibilities this entails. The result, therefore, has been that rural inhabitants in great need of local health facilities and willing to share in the cost of construction have been unable to obtain sponsors, and unable to qualify for Federal assistance under the Hill-Burton Act.

The bill I am proposing would amend the Hill-Burton Act to broaden its application so Federal funds might be used to assist rural communities to construct diagnostic and treatment clinics. The bill will do this by eliminating the present provision that only public authorities or nonprofit private associations or corporations which own and operate such clinics are to receive Hill-Burton funds. Thus, the bill would allow any private nonprofit association or corporation to obtain Hill-Burton funds on a matching basis without having to own outright or operate the facility to be constructed.

The bill contains additional safeguards to insure against abuse of its provisions. It limits the amount of Federal assistance to $25,000, it specifies that only areas with populations not exceeding 15,000 people are eligible for the aid, and it also specifies that such facilities are to be constructed with Hill-Burton funds only if they will provide services not otherwise available in the area.

The basic purpose of the bill is to aid in providing day-to-day medical facilities for people in rural areas. This means we must attract young, well-trained physicians to the area, and in order to attract them, we must have a clinic in which they can practice. By the time a doctor finishes his medical training he is broke, his parents are broke, and his total assets may not exceed a new bride and an old car. Is it any wonder that he is not interested in moving out into a community of 800 or 900 people and borrowing anywhere from $20,000 to $50,000 to set up a facility in which he can practice when all of this is available to him in large cities without any investment on his part? The bill will give rural communities a chance to cope with such a situation.

If enacted, the bill would greatly benefit the Nation by enabling more rural communities to acquire the health facilities which they badly need and are entitled to have. The greatest asset of any nation is good health. We must make certain that our citizens everywhere—in the cities and towns and on the farms—are not denied easily accessible modern facilities for the protection of their health.

STABILIZATION OF MILK PRICES

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, a severe and unfair financial hardship is being worked upon the milk producers of the Nation by the present contract procedures through which the Federal Government purchases milk for its military installations and other facilities.

The Government takes bids for its milk supplies through distributors, without regard to the production costs of the producers. Consequently, the distributors bid solely on the basis of whatever prices are necessary to obtain the Government contracts; and, after first deducting their own costs and profits, the distributors dictate to the producer a price on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

As a result, milk is being sold on Federal reservations at prices well below the prevailing retail level, and the dairy farmer is being forced to sell his milk to the Federal Government at a loss, which, inasmuch as he is a taxpaying citizen, amounts to double taxation and a subsidization of the Government.

This deplorable and discriminatory situation was well described in a recent statement by the Georgia Farm Bureau Federation; and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the text of that statement be printed herewith in the RECORD as a portion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This petition by the Georgia Farm Bureau to the American Farm Bureau Federation, for their help, concerns prices paid to milk-producing farmers under Government contracts throughout the entire United States and does not pertain to any particular State or area.

The present system of the Government, in buying a tremendous volume of milk has, over a period of time, and under its peculiar conditions, caused the price paid to the producing farmer to be hammered down and depressed to such an extent that the proceeds received by the producing farmer under a Government contract are far below those received from the prevailing price from the consuming public, the most accepted rule as a fair price for any commodity.

The price of such Government milk usually is dictated by the price of excess milk, or manufacturing grade milk, sometimes far below the standards of both quality and health deserved and demanded by the Government. Assuming that Government personnel deserves the best, along with the consuming public, the milk producer is put in position of producing a superior product at a very inferior price. Thus the farmer is selling to the Government at a financial loss.

Being taxpaying citizens of the United States, the producing farmer is placed in the position of paying double taxation, amounting to a subsidization of the U.S. Government, and this position is certainly contrary to the intention and principles established by a Democratic Government in doing business with other industries furnishing materials or services to the U.S. Government.

Since practically all Government contracts for the purchase of any material, or service is designed to guarantee a minimum wage for labor, it is contended by the milk-producing farmer that his monetary return from his salable product amounts to his wage, and, as such, his return should amount to that of the prevailing price paid by the general public.

This sad plight of the producing farmer has been depreciated by the milk distributor, or dealer, who controls the disposition, and price of the farmer's product, with or without the consent of the producing farmer. Under such dictation the milk distributor always takes care of his financial undertaking, but without regard for the welfare of the farmer who produces the commodity involved in the transaction.

Thus the producing farmer is caught in the financial squeeze between the efforts of the Government to buy milk at the cheapest possible price and the negotiations of the milk distributor.

These principles of buying milk have not only worked a financial hardship on the milk producer, but has also caused very bad public relations between the general consumer and the milk industry through the misunderstanding as to how the industry was able to sell to the Government at a vastly reduced price as compared to the price offered the public. Public relations of the industry have been further damaged by the Government personnel buying milk from a Government commissary on behalf of friends and neighbors of the consuming public.

Damaged public relations, through misunderstanding caused by practices of our Government, cannot be tolerated as it only encourages the use of synthetic or artificial products detrimental to the farmer producing the pure and natural products of the soil.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I do not believe the people of the United States expect the dairy farmers to have to sell their milk to the Federal Government at a loss. It seems only reasonable to me that a Nation which can afford to spend an average of $5 billion a year for foreign aid can likewise afford to pay its dairy farmers a fair price for their milk.

To remedy this situation, Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], I introduce a bill to require that the Federal Government make its milk purchases at not less than the prevailing retail price paid to producers in the area where the consuming installation is located.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and that its text be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1771) to assist producers of milk to obtain a fair and reasonable price for their milk production and to provide for more stable milk prices, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. TALMADGE (for himself, Mr. YOUNG of Ohio, and Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) notwithstanding any other provision of law, any contract entered into by the United States and a distributor of milk for the supplying of milk to a designated installation or facility of the Federal Government shall provide (1) that the price paid by the distributor to the producers of the milk delivered under any such contract shall be not less than the prevailing price paid to producers of milk in the area in which such installation or facility is located (hereinafter referred to as "minimum price"), and (2) that the price paid by the United States to the distributor under any such contract shall be an amount equal to not less than the minimum price paid to producers of milk in the area in which such installation or facility is located, plus the cost of the distributor of processing such milk and delivering such milk to such installation or facility. The distributor's cost of processing and delivering shall be determined on the basis of the most recent certified cost record of the distributor, and any other evidence which tends to establish the most recent cost of the distributor that may be available. Each such contract entered into by the United States and a distributor shall specify separately in its terms the minimum price to be paid by the distributor to the producers of the milk delivered under such contract and the cost to the distributor for processing and delivering such milk.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a), in any case in which the milk supplied to an installation or facility of the Federal Government is milk produced outside the area in which such installation or facility is located, the minimum price to be paid by a distributor to producers of milk for milk supplied under any contract described in subsection (a) may be reduced by the cost of any transportation of the milk in bulk necessitated by reason of such milk having been produced outside the area in which such installation or facility is located. Any such reduction in the minimum price to be paid to producers of milk shall be limited to transportation costs incurred in transporting the milk in bulk form prior to processing for delivery by, or for, the distributor. No reduction in the minimum price to be paid by the distributor to producers of milk under any contract described in subsection (a) shall be made for any transportation costs incurred after the processing of the milk. The minimum price to be paid to producers of milk by a distributor under the terms of any such contract shall not be reduced on account of any costs incurred by the distributor after the milk has been processed.

(c) The minimum price to be paid by a distributor to producers of milk delivered under any contract described in subsection (a) shall, in the case of any installation or facility of the Federal Government which is not located in an area as defined in this Act, be determined by the commissioner of agriculture or other comparable official of the State in which such installation or facility is located.

SEC. 2. (a) No contract for the supplying of milk to an installation or facility of the Federal Government shall be entered into unless the distributor agrees to make available for inspection by appropriate officers and employees of the United States such records of the distributor as may be necessary for the purpose of effecting the provisions of this Act.

(b) Any information relating to the cost operations of a distributor which is made available pursuant to this Act to officers and employees of the United States shall be confidential; and, except as provided by regulation of the department or agency for which such officer or employee works, no officer or employee of the United States shall disclose any such information made available by any such distributor. Any officer or employee of the United States who discloses any such information in violation of the regulations of the department or agency for which he works shall be dismissed from his office or employment.

SEC. 3. The provisions of this Act shall not apply to contracts for supplying milk to installations and facilities of the Federal Government outside the United States.

SEC. 4. As used in this Act—

(1) The term "milk" shall mean the clean lacteal secretion obtained by the complete milking of one, or more, healthy cows properly fed and kept under sanitary conditions specified for such milk in the area of delivery and containing not less than 8¼ per centum solids, not fat, and not less than 3¾ per centum butterfat, and containing bacteria not in excess of the quantity specified for such milk in the area of delivery of the designated installation or facility of the Federal Government. Such term shall include milk known in various localities as "class I", "approved", or "grade A fluid milk", or grades of like quality.

(2) "Distributor" means an individual, partnership, corporation, cooperative association, or any other business unit engaged in the handling of milk.

(3) "Area" means any area designated or specified for the regulation of milk pursuant to State law or regulation, or a Federal milk marketing order issued pursuant to the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, as amended.

(4) The term "bulk milk" shall mean milk prior to processing in containers of not less than ten gallons.

(5) The term "processing" shall mean any change in the physical or chemical structure of milk after milking, such as pasteurization, standardization, separation, bottling or other processes necessary or common to the usual delivery of milk for human consumption.

REDUCTION OF CERTAIN SALARIES IN LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on Tuesday April 7, I said on the floor of the Senate that the "cancer of inflation is eating away the people's substance." At that time, I called upon the President to lead the way in economy in the Executive Offices and that the Members of Congress should follow his example and reduce their salaries and office expenses in the same proportion that the President reduces his office expenses.

As I stated in that speech of April 7, we have been witnessing the spectacle of labor demanding and getting wage increases while at the same time industry utilizing these wage increases to demand increased consumer prices. This is indeed the vicious circle of inflation on inflation.

On at least two occasions within the last month, President Eisenhower has called upon both labor and industry to assist him in forestalling the upward turn in prices, yet today you can pick up a newspaper and read the unending demands of steel companies requesting steel unions not to seek wage increases and in turn the steel unions asking the major steel companies not to increase the price of steel, but to increase wages.

Mr. President, it is alarming to note that since World War II, we have seen 12 increases in the price of steel and 11 increases in wages, but the steel companies and the steel unions blame each other for this constant increase in prices and wages. Unfortunately, it is the farmer who buys farm machinery, the consumer who buys automobiles, appliances, and other articles containing metals, the people who live on social security, pensions, stable salaries and the like, are those who are confronted with higher prices and higher living costs who must pay because of this vicious inflationary spiral.

I know that under the Constitution of the United States, Congress cannot pass legislation reducing the salary of the President of the United States during his term in office, but there is nothing that will prevent the President from voluntarily cutting his salary 15 percent.

Today I am introducing a bill to cut the salaries of the Vice President, the Speaker of the House, the U.S. Senators and Representatives by 15 percent.

The time to reduce the appropriations for the Executive Offices of the President is when the matter comes before the Senate Appropriations Committee and before the Senate, at which time I shall ask that they be reduced 10 percent.

However, today I am asking Congress to reduce by 10 percent the amount alloted for the operation of the offices of the Members of Congress.

As I stated previously, Congress should authorize billions for defense but not one cent for waste. All this running hog-wild with the taxpayers' money simply must be stopped. It is just a question of whether we, the officials duly elected by the people, have the stamina, the strength and the nerve to cut our own operating expenses and lead the country to a sensible state of economizing without adversely affecting the economy and the security of our Nation.

Mr. President, the people want a balanced budget and they want economy in Government. I have been trying to urge this since this session in Congress began. I hope that Congress will act effectively in economizing in Government and balancing the budget.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1775) to reduce the compensation and clerk hire allowance of Members of Congress and the Vice President, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

DESIGNATION OF FIRST SUNDAY OF JUNE OF EACH YEAR AS "SHUT-INS' DAY"

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, convinced as we are of the strength, vigor, and prosperity of our country, I fear we may take too lightly the challenge expressed by Judge Jerome Frank, when he said "The test of the moral quality of a civilization is its treatment of the weak and powerless."

It is thus in behalf of our countrymen who are sick, handicapped and afflicted, that I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution which designates the first Sunday in June of each year as "Shut-Ins' Day." I hope that on this day we shall all make special effort to honor the magnificent courage which these people are demonstrating each day of their lives. Not only can we honor their courage, but also their achievements, which are of great significance, especially in view of the enormous difficulties which they must constantly overcome.

Each of us can pay tribute to the shut-in in his own way—by personal visit, a small gift or message. The President of the United States would take the lead in the commemoration of this day by issuing a proclamation providing for the display of the flag on all Government buildings and urging the people to participate in observance of the day.

Worthwhile efforts are already being made to encourage the sick and disabled in overcoming their handicaps. Shut-in clubs and social service organizations throughout the country have taken up their cause. My home city of Rochester, N.Y., has been a pioneer and leader in such efforts. In addition to the dedicated service of such groups, however, much can still be done. The magnitude of the problem is too great to be handled by a few people.

It should come as no surprise that we in America have literally millions of shut-ins among us. A survey by the Public Health Service covering the civilian non-institutional population indicated that in 1957 about 2 percent of the national population had trouble getting around alone, 1 percent could not get around at all alone, and 1 percent were confined to their households. These percentages would, of course, be considerably higher if persons in institutions were also included. Our older people number especially high among the shut-ins. About three-quarters of a million people over 65 are confined to their homes. Younger people are also affected, however. Nearly one-half million people under age 45 are confined to home or cannot get around alone.

Medical research is now making it possible for many more persons to avoid being afflicted with disabling diseases, and to restore many of those who are afflicted to good health. In the State of New York, for example, there were only 101 cases of paralytic polio in 1957 as compared to the 1,376 case average for the 3 years prior to the first use of the Salk vaccine. Similar, though less spectacular, advances have been made in combating other diseases.

Being realistic, however, I know it will be many long years before New York, or the United States at large, will have solved all of its major health problems. Furthermore, a large segment of our population must live with their handicaps here and now. In their behalf, then, and in support of the great work being done by our many shut-in groups and societies, I urge Congress to enact this joint resolution, which will bring friendship, kindness, and a new spark of happiness into the lives of so many Americans. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 93) designating the first Sunday of June each year as Shut-Ins' Day, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the movement to encourage friendship for the sick and shut-ins is being sponsored by shut-in clubs and through programs of other organizations; and

Whereas this movement has served thousands of sick, physically handicapped, and afflicted shut-ins in the homes, hospitals, and institutions for the disabled throughout the United States by encouraging them to overcome their handicaps in times of distress and discouragement; and

Whereas there are now many heroic veterans of our wars who are shut-ins because of the wounds which they have suffered in battle for their country; and

Whereas, through this movement, neighbors and friends have been encouraged to do acts of kindness which have alleviated human suffering and brought spiritual uplift to shut-ins in moments of stress and futility: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first Sunday of June of each year is hereby designated as "Shut-Ins' Day", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue annually a proclamation calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all Government buildings on such day and urging the people to observe the day by remembering the sick and disabled through personal visits, flowers or other gifts, messages, or other acts of kindness.

ASSISTANCE TO STATES IN WILDLIFE RESTORATION—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, it is a pleasure for me to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART] joins me as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 1021) to amend the act providing aid for the States in wildlife restoration projects, with respect to the apportionment of such aid. I ask unanimous consent that his name be listed as a cosponsor of Senate bill 1021 when it next is printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

By Mr. YARBOROUGH:

Several articles from the Army Times recommending extension of GI law benefits to Korean veterans.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON SECRECY AND SCIENCE BY SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I wish to announce, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the subcommittee has scheduled a public hearing on the subject of "Secrecy and Science" on Tuesday, April 28, 1959, in room 1202 of the New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

This hearing will deal with a subject with which the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee has long been concerned, the effect of undue secrecy on scientific development and progress in the United States. The subcommittee has been attempting to obtain the views of scientists throughout the country on this vitally important subject, and has scheduled this particular hearing in order to hear Dr. Arthur H. Compton, Nobel prize-winning physicist from Washington University in St. Louis, Mo., while he is in Washington, D.C.

THE COMMISSIONER OF THE BUREAU OF RECLAMATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on Friday, May 1, the Bureau of Reclamation will have a new Commissioner.

W. A. Dexheimer, after 6 years as Commissioner will resign as of that date; and the President has announced as his successor the present Associate Commissioner, Floyd E. Dominy.

For his untiring efforts to improve Federal-State relationships and thereby open the way to greater cooperation in the development of our water resources, we owe a debt of gratitude to Commissioner Dexheimer.

I, personally, am grateful to the Commissioner for the aggressive manner in which he has conducted, through reclamation field offices in Texas and particularly through my very able friend, Harry P. Burleigh, a series of broad studies relating to water supply and water requirements. Harry Burleigh has devoted his great abilities to developing a comprehensive water program for my State and has directed this work in the finest traditions of the Reclamation Bureau.

These studies, conducted under the name of the gulf basins project, were instigated at my request. The purpose was to determine as quickly as possible the true role that water supply must play in the years ahead and the manner in which the Federal Government can most effectively aid in attaining full development of water resources.

The significance of these studies was quickly grasped by Mr. Dexheimer, and the Bureau of Reclamation has prosecuted them with great vigor.

This information will now become the cornerstone of further work by the U.S. Study Commission for Texas Rivers, an agency created during the last session of Congress.

In the light of a long and meritorious career with the Bureau of Reclamation, we are sorry to see Commissioner Dexheimer leave, but we can appreciate his desire to seek new fields of endeavor.

It is fortunate that a career employee of the Bureau of Reclamation will become the new Commissioner.

As a county agent in Wyoming in the drought days of the 1930's, Associate Commissioner Dominy learned early the importance of water resource development. A veteran of 25 years of Federal service, he associated himself with the Bureau of Reclamation as a land development specialist in 1946; and since that time he has risen rapidly through the ranks.

Because of wide interest in the important position he will assume, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an Associated Press dispatch which details the background and experience of Commissioner-elect Dominy.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Daily Sentinel, Apr. 12, 1959]

AGRICULTURAL AGENT DOMINY MAKES GOOD

(By W. Joynes MacFarlan)

WASHINGTON.—Back in 1936, Floyd E. Dominy was a county agricultural agent in Wyoming when he sparkplugged a water conservation program.

Today, Dominy credits grasping that opportunity with starting him on the way to becoming the next Federal Reclamation Commissioner.

Dominy takes over May 1 as boss of the Interior Department's Reclamation Bureau, which is seeking $251 million from Congress to finance its operations for the next fiscal year. He says he plans no major policy changes.

Dominy already is widely known in western reclamation work because of his service with the Bureau since 1946. This has included being an assistant and then associate commissioner.

He is not an engineer but says his background fully qualifies him for the post to which President Eisenhower appointed him last week. Engineers will continue to make engineering decisions for the Bureau, he adds.

"My background in agricultural land use and water conservation certainly qualifies me to assume direction of a western resource development agency," Dominy told reporters.

"The purpose of reclamation," he said, "is to develop water resources of the arid and semiarid West for the benefit of the West and the Nation.

"I have been identified with that kind of work since I got out of school."

Dominy, a 49-year-old Republican, will succeed Wilbur A. Dexheimer, who told Eisenhower he was resigning for personal reasons. Dexheimer was a career Government engineer before becoming Commissioner in 1953.

Dominy learned of his promotion last week an hour and a half after it was announced by the White House. His boss and sponsor, Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton, notified Dominy by phone. Dominy was in New Mexico on an inspection trip at the time.

Recalling his start in the water conservation field as county agricultural agent in Campbell County, Wyo., Dominy said:

"I grasped the opportunity in the fall of 1936, when I saw in the new range conservation program announced that September not only a way to conserve water but a way to provide a lot of people with jobs in those depression times.

"We went right to work while others thought it was too late to do anything that winter. We built 300 dams that first year to create stock water ponds. That was more dams in that county than were built altogether in several States."

The program led to Dominy's becoming field agent for the Western Division of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in 1938.

During World War II, Dominy served as an official of the Office of Inter-American Affairs and as a naval military government staff officer on Pacific islands reoccupied by Allied Forces.

Dominy is a native of Hastings, Nebr., which is also Seaton's hometown. But Dominy made it clear he feels his appointment was not based on hometown considerations.

"I never met Secretary Seaton until he was here as a Senator," Dominy said.

Dominy has another close tie to Hastings. He married the former Alice Criswell of Hastings on December 23, 1929.

After attending Hastings College for 2 years, Dominy said his wife enrolled at the University of Wyoming. He received his degree in 1932 and began his professional career as a vocational agriculture teacher in Hillsdale, Wyo.

TIGHT MONEY RUNS RIOT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on Monday of this week I warned that interest rates, which already have been shoved up very rapidly by the Federal Reserve Board, are going higher. In last night's Washington Star, Sylvia Porter, in an article entitled "'Tight Money' Coming Again," further confirmed my prediction that hard money is going to get even harder.

Miss Porter nails this down by writing:

These are not casual forecasts. What is to happen is now being foretold in the Treasury securities market—the market in which the Treasury borrows the money it needs to pay off maturing I O U's and to cover its current deficit. This market is the bellwether of all the markets, the place where experts seek clues to trend in borrowing, interest rates, etc.

And Miss Porter calls attention to the fantastic rise of 90-day loans from 1⅛ percent, a year ago, to 3⅛ percent, today—a virtual trebling in the cost of 90 day money; and a rise from 1½ percent to 3⅞ percent in 1-year money—an increase of more than 150 percent since a year ago. This is hard money run riot; and the experts tell us it is going to get worse.

Mr. President this is cruel, selective, premeditated inflation with a vengeance. It enormously increases the cost of automobiles, and especially the cost of homes, because both of these are bought on time, and interest is a principal element of their cost. It vastly increases the cost of hospitals and schools, because these necessarily are financed over a period of many years, and interest is by far the biggest single cost factor involved. This premeditated increase in the cost of money hits the small businessman and the farmer right between the eyes, for both of them must borrow heavily in order to survive. And this high interest-rate policy hits the taxpayer especially hard. The cost of servicing the national debt is becoming second only to the cost of defense, in its burden of the Federal budget, and has increased far more rapidly—by 20 percent—than any other expenditure in the President's budget. The local taxpayer is forced to pay more, too, because of the increased financing cost of every street or building the local government constructs.

But most cruelly of all, Mr. President, hard money keeps the unemployed out of work. Fewer homes will be built. Fewer automobiles will be manufactured. Fewer appliances will be sold and fabricated. What does this development mean, if it does not mean fewer jobs?

Mr. President, I recognize that the governors of the Federal Reserve Board are sincere, honest men of solid reputation. But I think the fact shout out that they are wrong. The Board is a creature of Congress, and we have clear responsibility to call on the Board for a full explanation to prove that, in fact, this tough, hard-money policy does hold down the overall cost of living, in view of the huge increase in the cost of all the things that are purchased with borrowed money.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Sylvia Porter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"TIGHT MONEY" COMING AGAIN

(By Sylvia Porter)

It will be more expensive to borrow money for your business or your home or other personal activities this fall than this spring.

The probability is that within a few months interest rates will be the highest in more than a quarter century.

The likelihood is that the Federal Reserve System soon will turn the credit screws again, act deliberately to cut down the supply of money in the banks available for loans.

The outlook is for a new phase of "tight money" as the business resurgence continues and the supply of money is curtailed while demands for credit climb on all sides.

These are not casual forecasts. What is to happen is now being foretold in the Treasury securities market—the market in which the Treasury borrows the money it needs to pay off maturing I O U's and to cover its current deficit.

MARKET IS BELLWETHER

This market is the bellwether of all the markets, the place where experts seek clues to trends in borrowing, interest rates, etc. When, for instance, the Treasury finds it harder and more expensive to borrow money, it means other borrowers, big and little, are going to find it harder and more expensive, to borrow, too.

And right now the Treasury is finding it more difficult to get cash and more costly to borrow.

Today the Treasury is paying 3⅛ percent for 90-day loans against 1⅛ percent a year ago. Today it is paying 3⅞ percent for 1-year money against under 1½ percent for identical loans in April 1958. Today the going rate to the Treasury for 5-year loans is over 4 percent; a year ago the rate was under 2½ percent.

At these prices, the Treasury can borrow, but investors aren't eager to lend to the Government. And for two vital reasons.

On one hand, the strong business upswing so clearly under way now makes it certain that demands for loans are going to swell.

The boom in homebuilding assures a record demand for mortgage money. The spurt in retail sales will force businessmen to borrow to restock their shelves with goods. The decisions of corporations to increase their spending for plants and equipment signal a rising demand for capital to finance the plants and equipment. The revival in the auto market means more loans on autos. The comeback in sales of appliances, furniture, etc., spells more demand for all sorts of installment loans. States and cities are borrowing all-time peak amounts. And the Government is competing heavily and constantly for cash as well.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM IS DETERMINED

On the other hand, the Federal Reserve System—which controls the supply and cost of credit in the United States—is determined not to expand the supply of money enough to cover all demands. For the Federal Reserve is convinced that if all who want to borrow can get loans easily and cheaply, inflation-breeding forces will be encouraged, and we'll take off on a new inflation spree.

In its dedicated effort to use every weapon at its command to curb inflation the Federal Reserve is likely to begin expanding its operations to "mop up" funds in the banking system.

It is also likely to raise again the rate it charges member banks for loans—the discount rate—and thus spur banks to raise the rates charged on loans to you. Since last June, the Federal Reserve has boosted its own loan rate three times to a current level of 3 percent; a fourth increase may come almost any time.

On Monday, May 4, the Treasury will tap its market for $4.5 billion to pay off some maturing I O U's. It'll pay one of the highest rates since the thirties for the cash. Then the signal of what is to come will be apparent to all.

IS UNITED STATES PRICING ITSELF OUT OF MARKETS?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, yesterday I submitted a resolution calling for an investigation of the consequences of the vast increase in the investment of American capital abroad. While I expressed enthusiastic approval of such investments' excellent effect in building up the economies of our friends, I pointed out the serious cost of fusing American capital, automation, and know-how with low foreign wage rates in exporting American jobs.

The April 27 issue of U.S. News & World Report carries an unusually well-documented study of a closely related problem, entitled "Is United States Pricing Itself Out of Markets?" Mr. President, because this excellent article supplements the heavy documentation I incorporated into the RECORD yesterday in support of my resolution, I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From U.S. News & World Report]

IS UNITED STATES PRICING ITSELF OUT OF MARKETS?—THE FACTS ABOUT INDUSTRIES HURT BY GOODS FROM ABROAD

(Many stories are told of goods from abroad pouring into the United States, taking jobs from workers. What is there to these stories? Where is industry being hurt? How can foreign industry undersell industries of the United States? Examine deeply, and you find that foreign competition—important for those affected—is growing, but is not yet a national problem. Lower wages are part of the story. Rising efficiency of industry abroad is another part. Result: An ability to undersell U.S. products in many American markets. Out of it all are coming pockets of unemployed in some industries, some communities.)

In industry after industry and community after community, goods coming from abroad take on real meaning. They are translated into lost markets and into little pockets of unemployed.

For the most part, the communities and the companies affected are small. Often they do not seem important in the broad scale of business. Yet to the individuals and communities involved the effect of imports is proving real.

To find out what is happening, U.S. News & World Report looked into many reports of lost markets and of competition that American businessmen could not meet. Over and over again, investigation revealed that rising wage costs and other expenses in this country, plus new equipment and growing efficiency abroad combined to cause trouble for the U.S. industry.

As the rest of the world modernizes its industry and develops skilled and lower-priced labor, the problems grow for more and more U.S. businessmen.

Examples that follow give you a picture of what now is happening.

NAILS

A company in Peoria, Ill., has a wage cost of more than $2.90 an hour in making eight-penny nails which it sells for $9.80 per 100 pounds in carload lots. Similar nails from a German plant that has wage costs of around 90 cents an hour are offered in New Orleans, duty paid, at $7.90 per 100 pounds and can be delivered in Peoria for $8.35. Nails made in Japan by workers who get 40 cents an hour are offered in New York at $7.45 per 100 pounds and can be delivered in Peoria for $8.52.

Imports of nails supply more than one-third of the U.S. market, and are more than 50 times as great as exports of nails.

BARBED WIRE

Barbed wire is an American invention, produced for many years both by big steel companies and by a number of smaller companies around the country. But, last year, a little more than one out of every two rolls of barbed wire sold in this country were made in foreign mills by foreign workers using foreign steel. Imports amounted to more than 50 times exports.

This explains why: A jobber in Dayton, Ohio, for example, can buy a ton of barbed wire made in Germany for $40 less than similar wire made in nearby Cleveland, where steel wages are roughly three times as high.

The industry estimates that the excess of imports over exports equaled, in terms of man-hours required to produce the barbed wire, about 650 full-time jobs. There is no tariff on imports of barbed wire.

BICYCLES

American manufacturers of bicycles have made a mild comeback against their foreign competition. In the past 3 years they have increased their share of the U.S. market from a low of 60 percent to 71.8 percent. How did they do it?

"We import chains, brakes, spokes, tires, and saddles and combine them with American-made frames and rims," one industry official explained. "We've cut our prices so that the industry averages only 2 percent return on gross sales. Our wage costs are about $2.30 an hour, compared with 60 to 70 cents in Germany and a little higher in Great Britain. We can't offset the difference by improved machinery and methods. There's nothing open to us in the technique of building bikes that's not open to the world."

SEWING MACHINES

Most of the business of producing sewing machines for American homes has gone to foreign factories. Singer is the only major manufacturer that still makes sewing machines in the United States.

White, traditionally No. 2 in the field, gave up trying to produce in this country late in 1957, after 80 years, and now has its machines made in Japan. It couldn't meet the low prices of imports with machines made in its U.S. plants. Now the company charges $225 for a machine that an official says would have to be priced at $325 if made in the United States.

A trend that worries American industry: In markets abroad, U.S. purchases are rising faster than sales

U.S. exports of manufactured goods	$7.4	$7.4	$8.0	$9.3	$10.4	$9.4
U.S. imports of manufactured goods	2.2	2.2	2.6	3.2	3.5	3.9

In 1953–58 period imports went up 77 percent and exports went up 27 percent.

STEEL FLATWARE

About 5 years ago, companies that manufacture knives, forks, and spoons made of stainless steel began to get stiff competition from imports—particularly from Japan. Their average price per dozen pieces was $1.91, and the price on Japanese imports was $1.15 a dozen. Imports took 8 percent of the market.

By last year, U.S. manufacturers had raised their price to $2.32 a dozen to cover increased costs of labor and materials. The price on Japanese imports had dropped to 84 cents a dozen. And 38 percent of the stainless steel flatware sold in this country last year was made in foreign factories—mainly in Japan, where wage costs in the industry are about 22 cents an hour compared with $2.13 in U.S. plants.

In that 5-year period, four companies went out of business, industry employment dropped from 3,100 to about 2,400. An official of International Silver Co., at Meriden, Conn., estimates that firm's layoffs due to declining production of stainless steel flatware is costing the community $5 million a year in lost buying power. Meriden is one of the areas designated by the Labor Department as having "a substantial labor surplus."

TYPEWRITERS

Five years ago, one out of every seven portable typewriters sold in this country was made overseas. Now it's 3 out of every 10. The answer is the price. A typical portable produced by a well-known American manufacturer sells for $79. You can get one that is almost identical, made in West Germany, for $69.

One American company now makes all its portables, both for oversea markets and sales in the United States, in a European plant, and all its office typewriters in a plant in this country. Another assembles its typewriters in this country largely using parts made in its European plants.

There also are steady increases in imports of calculating machines and other types of business machines—with many coming from oversea plants of American companies. One company makes identical machines in the United States and in Germany. It pays an average of $2.25 an hour to workers in its American plant, less than 60 cents an hour to its workers in Germany.

"We're being forced into setting up oversea plants, where labor costs are lower, in order to compete with foreign companies," says an official of one firm.

FISHING TACKLE

The manufacture of fishing tacke is not a large industry, but it is important to a company such as Lionel Corp. of New York, better known for its model electric trains. Lionel lost $469,000 last year, mainly because of competition of imports with its own Airex Division's line of fishing tackle.

"We're going to take a chance on the rest of 1959," says Lawrence Cowen, president, "but, if the situation doesn't improve, we will ship Airex's tools, dies, jigs, and fixtures abroad and manufacture outside the United States. Believe me, it's not a happy prospect, but we may have to do it if we want to continue that part of our business."

Mr. Cowen explains that on items where production is highly mechanized, such as tracks for model trains, Lionel has no trouble meeting foreign competition. "But, the moment you have to use a considerable amount of labor," he says, "then the lower wages in other countries give them a big advantage."

JEWELED WATCHES

One of the better-known watches made in America used to be the Waltham, manufactured in a big plant at Waltham, Mass. Now, three-fourths of the plant is leased out, the remaining fourth used by the Waltham Precision Instrument Co., which makes such things as gyroscopes, precision parts, and electronic instruments—but no watches. The Waltham Watch Co., an offshoot of the old firm, uses leased space in New York to assemble watches imported from abroad.

Three companies still produce jeweled watches in the United States—Elgin, Bulova, and Hamilton—but all of them also import part of the watches they sell. Bulova has a plant in Switzerland, and Hamilton and Elgin plan factories there. Hamilton has licensed a Japanese firm to make Hamilton-type watches—for sale in Japan at the start, then in world markets, and ultimately in the United States.

More than four out of five jeweled watches sold in this country are manufactured abroad.

CLOCKS

The Washington telephone directory has a listing for the "Clock and Watch Manufacturers Association of America." A call to that number brings the information that the association is folding up. Companies that still are making clocks and lower-priced watches say that, because of competition from imports, they can no longer afford a trade association.

One of the companies in this industry is E. Ingraham & Co., which as recently as 1956 employed 1,800 people in its clock and watch operations. Now, according to Robert E. Cooper, president, it has only 1,200—a drop of one-third. Ingraham's plant is in Bristol, Conn., which is officially listed as an area of substantial labor surplus.

Another surplus-labor area is New Haven, Conn. Its industries include New Haven Clock & Watch Co., which once had 2,000 employees, now is down to 325.

General Time Corporation, a giant in the industry, had a substantial dip in profits last year but managed to do better than most of its competitors. General Time produces most of the clocks and watches it sells in the United States in a plant in Illinois, but has factories in South America, Canada, and Scotland to manufacture for its sales abroad.

CLOTHESPINS

Ten years ago there were 13 plants around the country manufacturing clothespins. Now there are six. The seven others closed. They were unable to meet the competition of imported spring clothespins selling for as little as $3.85 a case, compared to $6.30 for similar pins made in U.S. factories.

One of these plants had been a major employer for many years in Richwood, W. Va., a city of 5,300. When the plant closed early last year, 200 people were thrown out of work, "and 150 are still unemployed," according to Mayor Keith Jarvis. Collections from a sales tax dropped 20 percent.

"It changed us from a city with a fair state of business to a depressed area," says Mayor Jarvis. "In a large city that wouldn't be many people, but that payroll meant very much to Richwood."

WOOLEN GLOVES

The manufacture of knit gloves is a small industry made up of small companies. Back in 1947, there were 44 factories making woolen gloves. They employed 5,000 workers, and produced more than 95 percent of the woolen gloves sold in the United States.

Now, three out of every five pairs of woolen gloves sold in this country are imported, mostly from Japan and Hong Kong. The U.S. industry is down to 16 companies, employs fewer than 2,000 workers. Much of the industry is located in Gloversville, N.Y., and its employment there has dropped from 900 to fewer than 500. Gloversville is officially listed by the Labor Department as an area of "substantial labor surplus."

HARDWOOD PLYWOOD

After two decades of manufacturing hardwood plywood, the Coastal Manufacturing Co. last December closed its plant in Denmark, S.C., a town of 3,500. Jobs were lost by 120 employees of the mill and 30 workers employed by contractors supplying logs to the mill. The community lost the company's $115,000 a week in wages and purchases.

"Imports have squeezed all the profit out of the business," comments Robert Zeigler, president and one of the three stockholders of the company. "We'd have been better off if we had closed a couple of years ago."

The plywood plant in South Carolina is one of more than 20 that have closed during the past 6 years during which imports mainly from Japan, have risen from 10 percent of the U.S. market to more than 53 percent. An official of one company estimates job losses in the industry at more than 11,000. An example of import competition, he says, is a price of 7 cents a square food delivered for a type of plywood his company has to sell for 17½ cents.

DINNERWARE

One of the largest U.S. manufacturers of dinnerware is the Homer Laughlin China Co., of Newell, W. Va. The company used to have 4,500 employes. Now it has 1,500, and is operating at 50 percent of capacity.

Laughlin, even so, has done better than a dozen of its competitors, who have gone out of business in the last 5 years in the face of rising imports of foreign dishes—mainly Japanese dinnerware priced at about half what the U.S. makers must charge.

"There has been a great mechanization of plants in the past 15 years," says J. M. Wells, Sr., general manager of the firm. "We think we have changed all the jobs it is possible to change to get greater mechanization and efficiency. But our labor cost is still about 65 percent of our selling price—we have been forced to pass along the savings in lower prices to meet import competition."

CAMERAS

More and more, you see imported cameras being offered for sale, or find American cameras equipped with attachments made abroad—such as flash guns and exposure meters. Government figures for 1958 reflect the trend. Imports of still cameras and parts totaled $20.7 million, exports only $5.8 million. For lenses, imports were $4.3 million, exports, $1.6 million.

But there is another side to the story. If you include all photographic products such as film, movie cameras, and equipment, and other products, you find exports totaled $90 million, imports $46.6 million.

WOOLEN FABRICS

Since late last year, more than 200 workers have been laid off at the Charlottesville Woolen Mills in Charlottesville, Va. Fewer than a dozen are left. The company is going out of business after 91 years, unable to continue making woolens at prices that will compete with foreign imports.

The average age of the laid-off workers is more than 50 years. Most have spent all their working years with the company, and some are of the second and third generations of their families to be employed at the mill. A typical comment of older workers leaving the plant for the last time: "I'm too old to be able to find another job, too young to get social security." Lost pay of these workers, $650,000 a year.

The Charlottesville workers are among more than a third of a million who have lost their jobs in the textile industry since World War II, and the mill is one of more than 700 that have been liquidated. The industry has had other serious problems besides foreign competition, but imports have played a big part.

Statistics on woolen fabrics for apparel, 1958 compared with 1957: Production by U.S. mills, down 6 percent; imports, up 7 percent. Exports? "We have practically no exports—our goods cost too much to compete in world markets," explained one industry official.

COTTON CLOTH

American manufacturers of cotton cloth breathed a little easier in 1957 when Japan voluntarily adopted a quota on exports of cotton goods to the United States. Total imports that year dropped to 122 million square yards from 188 million the year before, and U.S. exports rose to 548 million from 507 million in 1956 .

But last year two things happened to change the situation. First, shipments to the United States from Hong Kong and other areas outside Japan rose sharply, and imports jumped to 143 million square yards. Second, Communist China suddenly exported some 500 million square yards of cotton cloth at prices so low they apparently were set without regard for cost. U.S. exports dipped to 501 million.

"This not only hurt our exports but caused the Japanese to need more than ever to export to us," commented one American textile official.

Compared with 1953, the 1958 figures showed this: exports, down 19 percent; imports, up 123 percent.

AUTOMOBILE TIRES

The demand for automobile tires is increasing about twice as fast in other parts of the free world as in the United States, traditionally an exporter of tires. U.S. companies will help supply this rising foreign demand, but this does not mean exports from American factories will rise proportionately

For example, the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. reports it is expanding plants in 10 of the 20 countries in which it has factories, and will build a new plant costing $7 million in France. Some of the other big companies have similar plans for stepping up their overseas operations.

American imports of automobile tires are principally in smaller sizes for use on foreign cars. A sizable proportion of these imported tires come from overseas plants owned by U.S. companies.

AUTOMOBILES

Four years ago, the United States was exporting more than four times as many automobiles as it was importing. Now imports are running four times exports.

What does this mean in terms of jobs?

There is no way of figuring exactly, but it is possible to get a rough idea.

In both the first quarter of 1955 and the first quarter of this year, the industry's output of cars and trucks combined was about 26 per 10 employees. On this basis, employment in building cars and trucks for export is down by 17,000, while imports have risen by the equivalent of 55,000 jobs—a total of 72,000 fewer jobs.

Total employment in the auto industry is about 155,000 lower than it was 4 years ago. Except for the change in the import-and-export situation, employment would have been down by only 83,000 jobs.

Those calculations are approximate, and do not make allowance for the fact that the smaller imported cars may require fewer man-hours to build. But the estimates do give some idea of what the increase in imports and decline in exports mean in terms of jobs.

The Auto Story: Imports growing, exports slowing

Autos bought from other countries	29,505	34,555	57,115	107,675	259,343	431,608
U.S. cars sold to other countries	186,262	206,544	254,336	197,708	160,632	125,834

TRANSISTOR RADIOS

Walk into practically any store that sells radios, and you will find transistor portables bearing well-known American brands and, alongside them, imported sets that you can buy for $10 to $15 less. What you see is a situation that has the electronic industry worried, although transistor portable amount to only a tiny fraction of its output.

Transistor radios from Japan have taken over almost half the U.S. market for such sets. The Electronic Industry Association is looking into the effect of these imports on U.S. producers of transistors, which also are used in military weapons and equipment. The worry is whether these transistor manufacturers will be able to maintain their production facilities and continue research if they lose their civilian business.

The problem is not as serious for companies that make sets. One U.S. firm has arranged to bring in transistor portables from Japan to sell as part of its own line, and several others are considering importing sets or parts from Japan.

TURBINE GENERATORS

National defense was the main issue raised in the controversy over the decision of the Tennessee Valley Authority to buy a huge steam-turbine generator from a British company that underbid two U.S. firms by several million dollars. But there was another angle that was of special interest to workers in four U.S. cities—jobs created in the building of the turbine generator.

Man-hour estimates by the American firms that bid on the project, Westinghouse Electric Corp. and General Electric Co., figure out to about 350 full-time jobs for 2 years on direct production and 700 or more other jobs connected with the project. The Westinghouse plants for manufacturing such equipment are in East Pittsburgh and Lester, Pa. General Electric's are at Schenectady, NY., and Fitchburg, Mass. All are in depressed areas, officially classified by the U.S. Labor Department as areas with "substantial" labor surpluses.

The two firms said that, with English wage rates only about 37 percent of those in the United States for such work, they could not match the British bid. They argued that U.S. equipment should be bought, nonetheless, because foreign-made equipment would be difficult to repair or replace in time of war. The TVA disagreed, and turned down their protest.

Imports of manufactured goods, as accompanying charts show, are relatively few compared with exports of U.S. manufactured goods to markets abroad. Yet the trend is toward a rise of imports from abroad and a decline of exports from the United States to nations abroad.

Industry in other nations, in the years since the war, has modernized and learned American ways. And, while costs of production have been rising in the United States, such costs in many other countries have been rising less rapidly—at least for steel, machinery, and some other types of goods that are being imported into the United States in increasing amounts.

The U.S. producers trying to meet this competition have two alternatives if they want to stay in business: Turn to more automation, using fewer people, or shift production overseas.

MILITARY SERVICES SEEKING HALF MILLION POUNDS OF BUTTER FROM COMMERCIAL SOURCES AT THE SAME TIME COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION HAS 17 MILLION POUNDS OF BUTTER IN SURPLUS

EXCESSIVE SURPLUS ITEMS

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, for some time I have been pointing out what appears to be a great degree of fat and waste in the procurement system of the military forces. The most recent overall survey by the House Committee on Government Operations indicated that the military services had more than $44 billion worth of property in the supply system inventories. Of this amount, $14.5 billion was needed for peacetime operating purposes, and another $12.1 billion was set aside for the mobilization reserve. Thus, a total of about $27 billion of the $44 billion was needed for the peacetime forces, and to go to war tomorrow morning, if necessary, while the remaining $17 billion was in the form of excess or surplus supplies. It has been my contention that by drawing down on these surplus items, the military forces could save from $2 to $3 billion in the fiscal year 1960, and that these funds could be used, instead, for the procurement of missiles and to keep the combat troops of the Army and Marine Corps at the full strength which Congress has authorized, but which the President has refused to carry out, on the ground of lack of funds.

MILITARY PROCURES ITEMS SIMILAR TO THOSE DECLARED SURPLUS

I have also complained that the military forces seem to be buying items which are exactly alike or similar to items which they are at the same time selling as surplus items or which have found their way into the surplus items which have been distributed to communities through the civil defense program. On the floor of the Senate, last Friday, I gave several examples of this practice. The fact that the procurement programs of the Government are wasteful was brought forcefully to my attention again, today.

FRESH BUTTER FOR THE MILITARY

Each day, the Department of Commerce publishes a synopsis of the items which various military and civilian agencies propose to procure for government use. I hold in my hand the synopsis for April 17. The synopsis of such items on which the Army was seeking bids on April 17, 1959, included the following item:

Butter, fresh: 538,440 pounds—NIP 1355–59Q—NIP opening April 23, 1959.

This item was being sought by the Chicago Military Subsistence Market Center, at 226 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Ill., which procures large quantities of food for the military forces. The Army was seeking bids—which are to be opened tomorrow—for the supply of these half million pounds of butter.

CCC HAS 17 MILLION POUNDS OF SURPLUS BUTTER

My suspicions that the left hand of our Government does not know what the right hand is doing are verified by the fact that as of April 3—the latest date for which figures are available—the Commodity Credit Corporation had on hand some 17 million pounds of surplus butter.

This surplus butter is stored at various points around the country, including the Middle West. It is good, fresh butter which is kept under refrigeration; it cost our Government approximately 59 cents per pound—or over $10 million—to procure; and it also costs our Government further amounts to store.

While our supplies of surplus butter are relatively low, when compared with the supplies of surplus corn, cotton, wheat, rice, grain sorghums, and other items, I see no reason why the Army in Chicago should be advertising for some 538,440 pounds of fresh butter at the very time that we had—according to the latest available figure—some 17 million pounds of butter in surplus.

This, Mr. President, is yet another example of the kind of waste which could be avoided if our procurement system were better organized and if our procurement officials were more vigorous in seeking opportunities to procure surplus items from the supplies of existing Government agencies and departments.

Mr. President, from time to time I intend to bring to the attention of the Senate similar examples of waste and extravagance in the conduct of this administration.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR TALMADGE TO THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, last night the Daughters of the American Revolution, who are holding their annual meeting here in Constitution Hall, heard an outstanding address by my distinguished colleague and friend, Senator TALMADGE.

His remarks were a somber warning to all of us to take stock of how far our Nation has drifted away from the lofty principles and solid concepts upon which it was established. The Senator from Georgia aptly points out that if the Founding Fathers could return today, they would hardly recognize the ingenious system of government they devised in 1788.

The Senator concluded his remarks with a ringing call to the American people to demand a return to the basic constitutional precepts that have made us a strong Nation and a free people.

There is much food for thought for all of us in the Senator's forthright remarks. I commend him for them, and ask unanimous consent that they be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATION IN GREAT NEED OF ORGANIZATIONS PLEDGED TO UPHOLD OUR FORM OF GOVERNMENT

The following is text of remarks of U.S. Senator HERMAN E. TALMADGE, of Georgia, in delivering the principal address of the national defense program of the 1959 Continental Congress of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution held in Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. He was invited to speak by Mrs. Ray L. Erb, chairman of the society's national defense committee.

Mrs. Groves, Mrs. Erb, distinguished guests, and members of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, to have this opportunity to meet with your great organization is an honor for which I am deeply and humbly grateful.

I always have been an admirer of the loyalty and patriotism of the dedicated women of America who comprise the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

I always have subscribed to the fundamental principles of constitutional government and individual liberty which you Daughters of the American Revolution espouse so ably and vigorously.

I always have advocated the positive and dynamic approach to the preservation of our American heritage and institutions which your organization has championed from its inception.

Therefore, I take particular pleasure in having this occasion to salute you for all you have done and to urge that you redouble your efforts in the future.

Never in the history of our Nation have we stood in so great need of organizations and individuals pledged to uphold our form of government and the ideals in which it has its basis.

Never in the history of our Nation have there been so many who are working to destroy it and so few who are fighting to save it.

It is both frightening and heart-rending to sit in the Congress of the United States and witness the actions of those who, with apparent unconcern for the consequences, are spending us into bankruptcy and voting us into dictatorship.

It is even more alarming and discouraging to realize from the lack of public outcry that the masses of the American people either are unaware of what is taking place or are too apathetic or preoccupied to care.

When political advantage becomes more important than the public interest as the criterion by which our national policy is formulated, it is a distressing and lamentable commentary upon our national values.

And when those who speak out in defense of our American heritage find it necessary in turn to defend themselves against attacks made and asperisions cast upon their motives, it is a shameful and disgraceful reflection upon the vitality of our freedom and institutions.

The situation prompts one to reflect upon the disconcerting parallel between what is happening to our country and what the distinguished 19th century British historian, Lord Macaulay, predicted would happen to it.

Lord Macaulay did not believe in our democratic institutions.

He said they would sooner or later destroy liberty, or civilization, or both and he ventured, in a letter written in 1857 to an American correspondent, Henry S. Randall, that they would be the downfall of the United States during the course of the 20th century.

This, in part, is what he wrote:

"It is quite plain that your Government will never be able to restrain a distressed and discontented majority. For with you the majority is the Government, and has the rich, who are always a minority, absolutely at its mercy. * * * I seriously apprehend that you will, in some such season of adversity as I have described, do things which will prevent prosperity from returning; that you will act like people who should, in a year of scarcity, devour all the seed corn, and thus make the next year a year, not of scarcity but of absolute famine. There will be, I fear, spoliation. The spoliation will increase the distress. The distress will produce fresh spoliation. There is nothing to stop you. Your Constitution is all sail and no anchor. As I said before, when a society has entered on this downward progress, either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Caesar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand; or your Republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the 20th century as the Roman Empire was in the 5th—with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals, who ravaged the Roman Empire, came from without, and that your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own country by your own institutions."

Translating Lord Macaulay's vivid symbolism drawn from the past into contemporary counterparts, it is not too difficult to identify the Huns and Vandals of today who are doing exactly what he prophesied.

They are the welfare staters who believe that Government should be all things to all men and do all things for all men.

They are the economic planners who believe that Government finance is merely a matter of printing more money.

They are the social schemers who believe that all society should be pressed into the same mold and reduced to the lowest common denominator.

They are the Government centralists who believe that the affairs of all citizens can be regulated better by a national bureaucracy than by the people themselves.

They are the judicial supremists who believe that laws should be made by the decree of Federal judges rather than the vote of the people's elected representatives.

They are the one worlders who believe the world should be made over in our image with Uncle Sam footing the bill.

And just as surely as the Huns and Vandals sacked Rome fifteen hundred years ago, so will these latter-day spoliators destroy our Government and our country with it unless their aims are thwarted and their hands are stayed.

Lord Macaulay's fears for our future, as events are proving, were well founded; but the reasons which he assigned for his conclusions have turned out to be somewhat wide of the mark.

No one would minimize the dangers to liberty inherent in unbridled majority rule. The tyranny of majorities is well documented throughout the pages of history. It was a subject which had the attention of our Founding Fathers and it has been a matter of concern to all responsible leaders since the beginning of our Republic.

However, the responsibility for our present course as a nation rests not with an unchecked majority but rather with militantly vocal minorities which represent themselves as the majority.

No one would contend that our Constitution is a perfect instrument. Every period of our history has brought to light some defect or oversight in its provisions. Its framers recognized that problem in providing specific machinery for its amendment.

However, the cause of our present situation is not any inadequacy of the Constitution to impose sufficient restraint but rather the failure of the various branches of the Government to abide by the limits of its checks and balances.

If the founders of our country could return today, they would find it virtually impossible to recognize their handiwork.

Instead of a nation in which government at all levels is the least government necessary to do for the people what the people cannot do for themselves, they would find a nation saddled with an ever-encroaching Federal bureaucracy which is steadily embracing more and more affairs traditionally and constitutionally regarded as local affairs and personal matters.

Instead of a nation which respects the rights and integrity of other nations and demands that it be accorded the same respect, they would find a nation which takes the position that it is always right and everyone else is always wrong and which, in so doing, seeks to substitute words for wisdom, dollars for deeds and bluster for good faith.

Instead of a nation dedicated to faith in God and the right of the individual to achieve his highest destiny under God consistent with the right of every other individual to do the same, they would find a nation which has built unto itself false gods of creature comforts and has become so engrossed in an all-consuming quest for security that it has forgotten the words of the psalmist that "blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."

In the light of what they would find, I do not think they would be surprised to learn that, as a result, our enemies depict us throughout the world as a nation of neurotic, meddling busybodies who attempt to buy what we are unable to earn and to preach what we ourselves are unwilling to practice.

In the light of what they would find, I do not think they would be surprised to learn that, as a result, we are burdened with a tax load which borders on confiscation and a national debt which has mortgaged future generations and that government by laws enacted by the elected representatives of the people has given way to government by Executive order, judicial edict, and Federal bayonet.

In the light of what they would find, I do not think they would be surprised to learn that, as a result, we have become a nation plagued by stomach ulcers and heart attacks in which personal debt and national crime have reached all-time records and the Golden Rule is something which is used only to print on advertising rulers.

As a matter of fact, it is quite likely that they would detect a definite parallel between conditions as they now exist and those which they enumerated in the Declaration of Independence as justifying the formation of a new nation.

As a few examples of those similarities:

The Declaration of Independence charged that the King of England had "erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance."

Today we have a Federal Establishment so large that an organization manual of 791 pages is required to explain the functions of its various agencies and a budget of 1,027 pages is necessary to record the funds needed to finance its operation.

The Declaration of Independence charged that the King of England had "kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures."

Less than 2 years ago the President of the United States sent elite paratroopers into a sovereign State to force a new social order on its people at bayonet point and has indicated that he will not hesitate to repeat the performance in the future.

The Declaration of Independence charged that the King of England had subjected the people "to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws."

Since May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court of the United States has deprived the States and their citizens of their right to manage their own local institutions and to run their own local affairs despite the clear provisions of the 9th and 10th amendments to the contrary and the fact that Congress has passed no law on the subject.

The Declaration of Independence charged the King of England with "cutting off our trade with all parts of the world."

The United States now possesses an unmanageable $9-billion-plus agricultural surplus because the Department of State has taken the position that to sell American agricultural commodities competitively on the world markets might make some neutralist or Communist nation mad wtih us.

The Declaration of Independence charged the King of England with "imposing taxes on us without our consent."

Since World War II the American people not only have borne the world's heaviest tax burden but even worse have been subjected to a taxing scheme whereby the Federal Government takes its percentage of individual income before it reaches the hands of the taxpayer.

The Declaration of Independence charged the King of England with "depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury."

In 1957 the 85th Congress passed a misnamed "Civil Rights Act" which authorized Federal judges appointed for life to sentence American citizens to fines up to $300 and jail terms as long as 45 days without benefit of trial by jury.

In those as in the other comparable situations which could be cited, the facts today support the same accusation against our governing authorities as those of 1776 supported against the King of England—that of "abolishing our most valuable laws and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments."

The words of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson are indicative of what their reactions would be to the conditions existing in 20th-century America.

It was Washington who declared in his Farewell Address:

"If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation."

It was Jefferson who stated in a letter to William Ludlow:

"I think we have more machinery of government than is necessary, too many parasites living on the labor of the industrious"—

And who declared in 1801:

"The will of the people is the only legitimate foundation of any government, and to protect its free expression should be our first object."

Now, as in 1776, the "long train of abuses and usurpations" can be traced to the failure or refusal of the Central Government to be limited in authority to deriving—in the words of the Declaration of Independence—its "just powers from the consent of the governed."

That is the anchor of our form of government which Lord Macaulay failed to recognize and take into account.

That is the anchor on which we must rely if we are to prevent our Ship of State from being wrecked on the rocks of bankruptcy and totalitarianism or engulfed by the waves of inflation and anarchy.

The one characteristic which sets the Constitution of the United States apart as unique among articles of government is that it has its basis in what was so aptly termed by George Washington as "the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government."

The strength from which our Constitution derives its perpetuity is found in its first three words: "We, the people."

It was the people of the United States who ordained the Constitution of the United States to form a more perfect union, to establish justice and to insure domestic tranquility.

It was the people of the United States who established the Constitution of the United States to provide for the common defense, to promote the general welfare and to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity.

It was the people of the United States who initiated the Government of the United States through the Constitution of the United States and who, thus, are the source and repository of all its powers.

And it is the people of the United States themselves who must rescue the Government which their forefathers initiated and the Constitution which they ordained and established if the future of our Nation is not to be the fate predicted for it by its detractors.

Since we, the people, are the Constiution, it is up to us to defend it as we would defend ourselves.

The Constitution can only be as strong as are the people it protects and can only withstand the assaults made against it to the degree that it is supported and upheld by the general public.

The point was perhaps most effectively expressed by Daniel Webster when he declared:

"Hold on, my friends, to the Constitution of the United States of America and to the republic for which it stands. Nothing shall ruin the country if the people themselves will undertake its safety, and nothing can save it if they leave that safety in any hand but their own."

Thus it is clear that the essence of our concept of constitutional government is, as stated in the Declaration of Independence, that it derives its "just powers from the consent of the governed."

It is not an oversimplification to state that all of the serious problems which confront us—with the one exception of the external menace of international communism—are the direct result of the failure of those in responsible position of leadership in all three branches of the Federal Government to take into account the fact that governmental programs and policies to be implemented successfully must square with the "consent of the governed."

It is true as we have seen that policies and programs can be initiated and sometimes even carried out without the "consent of the governed" but ultimately, as always has been the case in our national life to date, when the will of the people has been asserted it has overwhelmed the efforts of those who sought to frustrate or circumvent it.

All of which brings us to the question: Why have the American people countenanced the trends and events which are so rapidly carrying our Nation down the road to economic ruin, state socialism, totalitarian government, and worse?

The answer, I think, embraces several factors.

In the first place, the great masses of the American public are unorganized and leaderless. They do not have the machinery of the tightly-knit pressure groups or the resources of the partisanly-motivated minorities for making themselves vocal and their convictions felt.

In the second place, the rank and file of our country's populace are confused about the issues. Bombarded day after day by the sloganeers and propagandists of our mass communication media, they find themselves incapable of distinguishing definitively between what is fact and what is fiction.

And, in the third place, the majority of the citizenry of the United States are too comfortable and complacent to become exorcised about things which do not touch their everyday lives. Only in those areas where usurpation and depression have awakened people to the realities of our plight are Americans yet fully aware of all the dire implications of our current situation.

However, it would be a terrible mistake for us to view these facts as anything but a challenge. Instead of despairing we should take our cue from our Founding Fathers who put their faith in the desire and willingness of the masses, once acquainted with the facts, to demand that our national house be set in order.

I, for one, am convinced that the majority of the American people do not approve of the current philosophy of government being pursued by the United States.

To the contrary the mail which I receive from all sections of the Nation indicates to me that the average citizen is gravely concerned about the present course of our Nation and the consequences of following it to its ultimate conclusion.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the American people want to see the Federal budget balanced and the Nation's economy stabilized.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the American people want the United States to cease doing for people in other countries what it either is unable or unwilling to do for our own citizens here at home.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the American people want the Federal Government to confine its activities to those areas reserved to it by the Constitution and leave the management of all other affairs to local people on the local level.

I am convinced that the American people want above all else for the United States to be made militarily and economically secure and for themselves to be left alone to run their own affairs and enjoy the fruits of their own labors.

The advocates of our present course maintain there is no alternative.

I emphatically reject that philosophy of fatalism.

There is an alternative to a foreign policy based upon the inevitability of world conflict.

There is an alternative to a domestic policy based upon the regimentation of people and resources.

There is an alternative to a personal philosophy based upon physical existence as an end unto itself.

That alternative is simply expressed in the development of an America so strong militarily, economically, and spiritually that any nation choosing to attack us invites not retaliation but annihilation.

And it is an alternative which can be realized only in a return to the principles of individual freedom, free enterprise economy, and government on all levels which is the servant, not the master, of the people.

Our present course offers only one of three ultimate conclusions: conquest from without, collapse from within, or development here in the United States of a totalitarian government as reprehensible as that which exists in the Soviet Union.

It is incomprehensible to me that free men and women living in a free society will choose to wait supinely for either of the first two consequences or to countenance passively the implementation of the latter.

I choose rather to believe with Thomas Jefferson that:

"The people may be misled or deceived for a time, but where the avenues of truth are open there men will learn to reject what is false and harmful. Where the people are well informed, they can be trusted with their own Government; whenever things get so far wrong as to attract public notice they may be relied upon to set them to rights."

I do not think I am wrong when I say that I detect throughout the Nation a growing awakening to the dangers inherent in our country's present policies and a swelling voice for a recognition of the lessons of the past through a return to the fundamentals of constitutional, republican government.

In a constitutional republic such as ours, the masses may not be immediately articulate, but once given leaders and leadership they are swift in making their wishes felt and known.

It is up to us who are aware of the threat to our liberty and institutions to see that the masses are informed of the facts of their peril and are given the leadership to make themselves heard here in Washington.

The outcome of our struggle to preserve individual freedom and constitutional government in this country will depend largely upon how strongly we feel about it and how hard we are willing to work to defend it.

It is not a job which either you or I can do alone.

But, by the same token, it is not a job which you and I can leave to someone else and seriously expect to get it done.

It is not a job which can be done by making speeches and passing resolutions.

Rather it is a job which must be done in the Halls of Congress, through the mails and at the ballot boxes.

To do the job the Daughters of the American Revolution and like organizations must descend on Congress with the same militancy and vociferousness with which the enemies of our American way of life pursue their ends.

To do the job the citizens of America must swamp their Senators and Congressmen with their letters, telegrams, and telephone calls.

To do the job the voters of America must insist upon clear-cut choices at the polls and cast an avalanche of ballots for the candidates who take their stand on the side of Government by the consent of the governed.

Nothing short of such drastic action will ever convince those in positions of responsibility that the partisan aims of pressure groups which they now are serving do not represent the thoughts and wishes of the masses of the American people.

If all of us will but put our efforts where our beliefs are, I am convinced that a public expression can be obtained and that expression will be to give Congress a mandate to reverse the course which threatens the destruction of our cherished form of government.

The world's greatest living statesman, Sir Winston Churchill, in his famed "Iron Curtain" address delivered 13 years ago at Fulton, Mo., gave words to our common duty when he declared:

"We must never cease to proclaim in fearless tones the great principles of freedom and the rights of man, which are the joint inheritance of the English-speaking world and which, through Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, the habeas corpus, trial by jury, and the English common law, find their most famous expression in the Declaration of Independence."

Our heritage as free Americans is that our Government's foundations rest upon the will of the people.

It is a heritage of which we are proud and which the entire world respects.

It is a heritage to which this Nation must adhere if our form of government and way of life is to be passed uncompromised to our children and their children after them.

It is a heritage which is to be put to an acid test in the issues now confronting our Nation.

You and I—and all Americans who cherish that heritage—have our work cut out for us if we are to protect and preserve it.

If we fail or falter in our clear duty to do so, we will deserve the fate which Lord Macaulay almost 100 years ago predicted would be ours within our lifetimes.

I thank you.

SURVIVAL OF COLUMBIA FISHERY REQUIRES INTENSIFIED RESEARCH PROGRAM BEFORE NEZ PERCE DAM SHOULD BE AUTHORIZED

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, plans for development of the water resources of the Middle Snake River have presented the Pacific Northwest region with a complex issue of conservation policy. The Snake and its tributaries offer great potential for construction of dams to provide power, flood control, irrigation, and navigation benefits. But the Snake and its mountain-born tributaries—the Salmon, Clearwater, and Imnaha—also serve as the main street for migratory Chinook salmon and steelhead which spawn in our region's upland headwaters.

Thus, a conflict has arisen over utilization of this great natural resource. Proposals for damming the Snake River bring into sharp focus the difference of opinion over dam construction in this stretch of the Columbia River Basin. I think that survival of the fishery which has occupied these waters since the beginning of time deserves top consideration in any plans for using the vast potential for power and flood-control storage. That is why I have sought the assistance of the Bureau of the Budget, Corps of Engineers, and Department of the Interior in implementing a program of fishery research designed to determine whether fish-passage facilities can be constructed in Middle Snake dams to assure the perpetuation of the migratory fish runs. This must be accomplished first before any dams, Federal or private, are approved in the Middle Snake. I have issued a statement setting forth my views in detail about the proposed Middle Snake River projects, and I ask consent to have those comments printed in the RECORD.

I desire to emphasize very strongly that I am opposed to authorization of any high barricade below the mouth of the Salmon River, with its great salmon-spawning grounds, until we have definite assurance from authoritative fishery biologists that migratory salmon can be passed safely both upstream and downstream past a barrier of such proportions.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

The Hell's Canyon Association has adopted a resolution favoring authorization of the Nez Perce Dam, with actual construction to be deferred until the fish-passage problem is solved.

On April 15 Senator MORSE introduced this resolution into the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with his endorsement.

I have been asked my stand on the proposal.

I am opposed to any authorization of Nez Perce Dam, provisional or otherwise, at this time.

In my opinion, the first step toward Middle Snake River development requires financing of an accelerated Columbia Basin Fish Research program as approved by Federal and State agencies of the Pacific Northwest region. Until this basic research is accomplished no one can forecast eventual solution of fish-passage problems involved in Middle Snake dams or prospect for rehabilitation of migratory fish. The section of the Middle Snake and its tributaries where fish problems are involved should be left open until research discloses a basis for judging possible construction.

This applies equally to the proposed Federal Nez Perce project and Pacific Northwest Power Corp.'s High Mountain Sheep-Lower Canyon proposal. It must be kept in mind that High Mountain Sheep Dam is tied in with the Lower Canyon project at the mouth of Idaho's Salmon River. This would be equally as disastrous as Nez Perce to the sanctity of the vital Salmon River spawning grounds.

No project blocking fish spawning should be permitted until conclusions are available from the fish research program. I have had a favorable conference with officials of the Budget Bureau, Corps of Engineers and Department of Interior on financing such research. The 1960 budget contains nearly $200,00 for this purpose and another $85,000 was recently allocated from Saltonstall-Kennedy funds for study of problems in moving fish around power dams. Through united effort I think we can obtain the balance of funds required to launch vastly-expanded research. This would be the proper schedule for advancing development of the Middle Snake.

We have repeatedly been advised by the Nation's leading fish biologists that no feasible plan has yet been proven for passing fish over a barrier as high as Nez Perce Dam would be. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service opposes Nez Perce Dam.

Furthermore, some 60 percent of the valuable spring Chinook salmon migrations of the Columbia River system spawn above Nez Perce Dam. The entire commercial and sports fishery could be wiped out if these migrations cannot pass such a barrier, either upstream or downstream.

Provisional authorization of Nez Perce Dam would be unprecedented. One might just as logically have supported FPC licensing of Brownlee Dam, subject to solving the private-utility problem; or have supported authorization of Bruces Eddy Dam, subject to solving the elk and wildlife problem; or have supported authorization of Echo Park Dam, subject to solving the National Park problem.

In my opinion, our remaining salmon fisheries deserve full and proper protection. They will not be receiving that protection if Nez Perce Dam is authorized prior to a genuine demonstration that major fish runs can survive a dam of these proportions.

Most of the great conservation organizations backed the bill for a high Hells Canyon Dam. They did so, in many instances, after we had assured them that there would be no support for Nez Perce or other barriers which could wipe out valuable migratory salmon fisheries. I intend to abide by such a promise.

CORWIN CHURCHILL MOTORS, INC., AND CHARLES J. WHITTEY

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, yesterday I stated on the floor of the Senate that the A. W. Lucas Co. was named "the brand name retailer of the year" of department stores in class II category for this award, and that the Honorable R. Fay Brown went to New York to receive the award on behalf of the company.

I also had inserted in the RECORD an article from the Bismarck Capital, March 20, 1959, which stated that the A. W. Lucas Co. won the "brand name retailer of the year" award and also that Corwin Churchill Motors, Inc., won national recognition in receiving a certificate of distinction in the automobile dealers category.

As I extended congratulations to the A. W. Lucas Co. and Hon. R. Fay Brown, today I wish to extend congratulations to the Honorable Charles J. Whittey and the Corwin Churchill Motors, Inc., for having won national recognition in receiving this certificate of distinction. It is nice to know that the North Dakota businessmen are considered tops in the Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KUCHEL in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the pending business, which will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

NOMINATION OF CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I wish to speak today in support of the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce as Ambassador to Brazil. And I wish also to comment on certain statements that have been made against that nomination, statements made before the Foreign Relations Committee on April 15, and on the floor of the Senate last week.

An Ambassador is essentially a personal representative of the President and the Secretary of State. President Roosevelt used to refer to "my ambassadors"; and, technically and historically, he was correct. An Ambassador is essentially a creature of the President, an extension of himself, who serves as his eyes and ears, as his informant, as his spokesman, and as the implementer of his policies in a given country.

Over the years the duties of Ambassadors have expanded greatly. Today's Ambassador is the administrator of a large organization and of many important programs. Today's Ambassador must deal in public relations, in ideological warfare, and in politics of the most complex sort. But an Ambassador nevertheless remains essentially the personal representative of the President. And the Senate has always been understandably reluctant to thwart the wish of any President in this regard.

The Senate, of course, must pass upon the qualifications of an ambassadorial appointee as part of its constitutional responsibility. We set up certain yardsticks and general qualifications. But Senate rejection of a Presidential appointee could only be justly based on the gravest of reasons.

I do not know Mrs. Luce well. I believe I have talked with her only once in my life, and then for only a few minutes. But though I have not known her personally, I have known her through her deeds, through her writings, and through the praise of many who know her and who admire her achievements.

Three Premiers of Italy, DeGasperi, Pella, and Scelba, have told me of their admiration for her performance as Ambassador to that country, when I asked them individually about her while visiting Italy on more than one occasion.

In my judgment Mrs. Luce's qualifications are impressive, and no argument of decisive weight has been made against her.

She is a woman of high intelligence. She is a student of foreign affairs.

She is an articulate, a gracious, and a dynamic representative of the American people.

She has had broad experience in important governmental positions.

She has demonstrated a real sense of personal dedication and a determination to master the exacting requirements in the fields of language, history and the other studies required for successful diplomatic representation.

She is a person of excellent character, and one who is held high in the esteem of her own countrymen and, it is no exaggeration to say, in the esteem of other peoples of the world.

I have studied her testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on April 15 and was favorably impressed with it, insofar as it pertained to her diplomatic duties. I was also favorably impressed with her obvious composure, her presence of mind, and the quality of her responses during a particularly trying cross-examination, in response to a line of questioning that she had no reason to expect, or to be prepared for.

In my judgment, and I think in the judgment of the majority of Senators, she has passed with flying colors all the reasonable tests by which an Ambassadorial nominee should be judged.

But Mrs. Luce is apparently being judged by additional standards—standards which I do not think are appropriate, and which, if they should be established as precedents, would have very dangerous consequences for the future.

There have been introduced as evidence against her fitness for this post partisan statements made by her concerning President Roosevelt and President Truman. On the basis of these statements, and Mrs. Luce's failure to retract them, at least one Senator has announced that he could not vote for the confirmation of her nomination.

Mrs. Luce's charges that President Roosevelt lied us into war and that President Truman was the hand picked candidate of the big city bosses were, in my judgment, intemperate and unjustified statements which went far beyond the limits of fair campaign tactics.

But a few regrettable and unfortunate remarks, made during the heat of hotly contested political campaigns, should not weigh more heavily in the balance than a life of brilliant achievement and a career of devoted service to the welfare of this country.

To oppose her confirmation on this ground would bring us face to face with an important and far-reaching question. To oppose her for this cause is to decree that those who must engage in the rough and tumble of political campaigns, and who at some time or other indulge in oversimplified, or intemperate, or unjustified statements, are forever disqualified from holding high diplomatic posts, however impressive their attainment may be.

We could not do this without foreclosing the field of diplomacy to almost all who engage in political life.

Nor can we set ourselves up as the final judges of the truthfulness of a person or a political party, and demand as a condition of confirmation that nominees recant any past statements with which we happen to disagree.

We cannot do this without establishing a requirement of omniscience that few, if any, could satisfy.

Mrs. Luce has apologized for the intemperate language in which her remarks about President Roosevelt and President Truman were couched, but she has refused to repudiate the basic sentiments underlying those statements.

While I certainly disagree with the point of view she expressed then, and restated during the committee hearings of last week, I believe that she is entitled to her convictions as to the failings of Democratic Presidents.

We cannot disqualify people as untruthful people because they take a position violently antagonistic to our own position.

We who deal in the field of political opinion, we who contend in the arena of unproved ideas, cannot apply severe and rigid standards of truth and falsehood to the statements of those with whom we disagree.

When dealing in opinion and speculation we must usually wait for the verdict of history to determine whether our view was wise or foolish, right or wrong. We can only say what we think to be true and hope to be true. We ought to assume that others are motivated by the best of intentions and hope that they will attribute the same motives to us. And so it should be with Mrs. Luce.

At the committee hearings on April 15, Mrs. Luce was challenged to bring forth documentation of her statements about President Roosevelt and President Truman. I understand that she has since offered some.

There are few positions or causes so discredited that a host of documentation cannot be introduced in their favor. I am sure that Mrs. Luce—and I say this frankly—can summon forth a great deal of support and documentation for her views, support with which I disagree, and documentation which I could not accept.

But all this proves is that there is no final, definitive documentation to prove or disprove expressions of political opinion upon political issues of great moment.

The same charges Mrs. Luce made against President Roosevelt were made against Woodrow Wilson, against William McKinley, against Abraham Lincoln, and against James K. Polk.

The documentation on both sides of each of these older disputes continues to grow; and we may expect a century of conflicting historical opinions on the acts and motives of President Roosevelt.

The age which produced the statements we are discussing was an age of political rancor and bitterness. Our reaction to the depression at home and to the emergence of nazism and communism abroad gave rise to a host of errors, and a legion of false prophets.

The mistakes which were made by the America Firsters and the Communist fronters, which interestingly seem now to have been forgotten and forgiven, were far more serious than the errors attributed to Mrs. Luce.

After forgetting and forgiving mistaken views that almost cost us our freedom and our security, I ask, shall we draw the line now and point the finger at Mrs. Luce for a few ill-considered and ill-tempered campaign accusations? I hope that we shall not.

A second argument against Mrs. Luce's confirmation is the charge that she interfered in Italian domestic elections by stating this country's opposition to extreme rightist or extreme leftist parties during the Italian elections.

Mrs. Luce has insisted that she was merely stating the official policy of the State Department and the long-standing policy of the Nation. She stated that her predecessor, Ambassador Dunn, had taken the same position in previous elections much more vigorously and forcefully.

Mrs. Luce's statement that the United States could not extend the same cooperation to a Fascist or Communist government that it does to a democratic government strikes me as sound and right, and I accept Premier DeGasperi's statement that it had no harmful effect on the Italian election.

It has been said that Mrs. Luce prejudiced American relations with Italy by indulging in a personal oil policy opposed to the public development of Italian oil resources. Here, again, Mrs. Luce replies that she was only carrying out the policy of the President and of the State Department.

The very fact that Mrs. Luce has been nominated serves as convincing evidence to me that she was in both instances merely carrying out the policy of her Government.

If Ambassador Luce had attempted to influence an election in violation of the wishes of her superiors, if she had pursued her own personal oil policy—one which differed from official American policy—then there would certainly be grave doubts as to her fitness for an Ambassadorial post.

But it should be clear to all that her nomination would not be before the Senate today if the President and Secretary of State did not place the highest value upon her service in Italy and did not have the utmost confidence in her judgment and in her strict adherence to the policies and procedures established by her superiors.

That being the case, surely we cannot in justice oppose Mrs. Luce, whether or not we agree with those policies.

We cannot indict the performance of any Ambassador who carries out the policies of the State Department, merely because we disagree with those policies. To do so is to forget that it is the President's policy, not ours, that an Ambassador is charged with carrying out.

I do not believe that we reflect credit on our Democratic Party when we interpose partisan standards and tests of political conformity in the way of a Republican President's choice for his personal representative.

I am happy and proud to say that throughout the years since 1953 while we have been the opposition party in Congress, we have in large measure avoided the harassment and the partisan recriminations that so often were visited upon the previous administration of a Democratic President to the great disservice to our country.

I think our course of behavior has helped to earn the confidence of the people which our party now enjoys. I hope that we will not squander that confidence and dilute that reservoir of good will by indulging in petty and acrimonious attacks on qualified and deserving Presidential appointees.

I believe we render a disservice to the United States when, without just cause, we subject the nominee for a high diplomatic post to the type of attack that might send any Ambassador to a foreign land under a cloud of suspicion, under an implication that he carries less than the full confidence and backing of the American Government and people.

Therefore, I hope that my colleagues in the Senate will vote the prompt confirmation of Mrs. Luce as our next Ambassador to Brazil.

She will bring to that post all of the great ability, the vast energy, and the personal dedication that have marked her brilliant career in private and public life.

She will bring to that post broad experience in political and human affairs as well as a personal charm and graciousness, and a compassionate insight into the problems of other peoples that marked her distinguished career as Ambassador to Italy.

The splendid example of Clare Boothe Luce has opened wider and wider opportunities for women in public life, and the whole Nation is the better for it.

Mr. President, our relationship with our South American friends has entered a difficult period. There is therefore a special need for ambassadors in this area of the world who possess the rare qualities so often demonstrated by Mrs. Luce. I heartily support her nomination for the post of Ambassador to Brazil; and it is my hope that it will be favorably reported by the Foreign Relations Committee and promptly confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I am happy to yield to my distinguished senior colleague.

Mr. BUSH. I rise to congratulate my colleague from Connecticut upon the fine address he has made concerning the appointment of Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil.

I especially commend him for his analysis of what an Ambassador is and what he should be, and what the attitude of the Senate should be with respect to its constitutional duties by way of consideration and confirmation of the nomination of an appointed Ambassador. The Senator has made a very fine analysis of that subject, and one which should be called to the attention of all Senators from time to time.

Secondly, I think my colleague has made an excellent appraisal of Mrs. Luce's personality. I endorse all he has said on that subject; and I say this in the light of an acquaintance with the lady of many years' standing. I feel that my able colleague from Connecticut has very properly appraised the lady's qualifications for this very important post.

Finally, let me say that I think it is unfortunate that any particular issue has been raised with respect to the appointment of Mrs. Luce at this time. I do not believe that anything adverse to her has been proved. After all, her nomination as Ambassador to Italy was confirmed by the Senate in 1953. Following that, she made a very distinguished record as Ambassador.

Her nomination would never have been sent to the Senate at this time by the President and the State Department had there been any doubt that she had been an excellent Ambassador during the years she served as such in Italy. Still since every cloud seems to have a silver lining, I think we can say that this discussion may have served some useful purpose, in that it has brought forth statements such as the distinguished junior Senator from Connecticut has made on the floor of the Senate, and statements in the press and elsewhere, which I hope have confirmed in the public mind the excellence of this appointment.

In conclusion, I thank my friend for giving me the opportunity to comment, and to congratulate him upon his speech.

Mr. DODD. I am very grateful to my distinguished senior colleague for his remarks.

I am greatly interested in the welfare of my party, but I have never believed in personal attacks on members of the opposition party. I think it is an indication of political maturity and good taste to refrain from that sort of thing, particularly with respect to an ambassadorial appointee to an important post such as that to Brazil. I would not want her to go there if there were any doubt in the minds of the people of that great country as to whether she had the full confidence and support of the American people.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. DODD. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. KEATING. First, I wish to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, not only upon his remarks relating to this particular appointee, but also for the general guideline which he has so eloquently laid down, and which should measure our responsibilities in determining whether a nomination should be confirmed.

I think the speech which the Senator from Connecticut has made could well serve as a document for all of us to ponder, no matter what administration might be in power.

The first attack upon the qualifications of Mrs. Luce had to do with the performance of her duties as Ambassador to Italy. She served in that capacity for nearly 4 years, and established a record of which this country can justly be proud.

During her tour of duty as Ambassador relations between the United States and Italy became increasingly close. We all know the many ties of blood and culture which link our two countries; and it is greatly to Mrs. Luce's credit that those ties were strengthened and solidified.

Today, more than ever, Italy is a stanch, loyal ally and friend within NATO. For that, a full measure of credit should be extended to the work performed by Mrs. Luce.

She traveled extensively throughout Italy, and had a deep knowledge and understanding of the country and its people. Wherever she went, even in the most remote parts of the land, she was greeted with admiration and respect. I have traveled in remote parts of Italy, and wherever I traveled I have heard people speak of Mrs. Luce with affection. She was well received by the people not only because she was the American Ambassador, but also because she was intimately acquainted with their hopes, their problems, and their every-day activities.

She was beloved by her staff, and universally respected. She is a hard and tireless worker, and was closely connected with the multiple activities of her important Embassy. Her associates soon came to know that she was a working Ambassador, a person who had come to do a real job.

One of the major achievements of postwar diplomacy was the settlement in October 1954 of the deep-seated trouble between Italy and Yugoslavia over Trieste. This problem had all but ruptured relations between Italy and Yugoslavia and had a most adverse effect on Italy's relations with its Atlantic friends. Mrs. Luce quickly came to realize that unless this problem could be settled, and settled soon, Italy would not be able to make its full contribution to Western strength in the face of potential Soviet aggression. With persuasion, with tenacity and perseverance, she untiringly guided this question toward negotiation and final settlement. What had seemed the impossible had been achieved, and to Mrs. Luce must be given an important share of the credit. She had shown herself to be a diplomat's diplomat.

Ambassador Luce's stanch and unyielding opposition to communism in any and all its forms is too well known to bear mention of it here. That it was also well known in Italy was amply attested to by the attacks, the often vicious, scurrilous charges which were frequently hurled at her by the Communists and the fellow travelers. The Communists and their allies denounced her and her works in parliament, in the public squares, in the press, or wherever they could.

But the Italian Government and the vast majority of the Italian people thought differently of Mrs. Luce. Her departure from Italy was the cause of much sorrow. Having come to her post in an atmosphere of doubt that she, a woman, was capable of doing the job, she left at the end of her tour in an atmosphere of confidence, respect, and strength. The Italian Government tendered its highest decoration to her; from humble, unknown people in all parts of Italy came tokens of affection and esteem.

In this country her record of achievement did not pass unnoticed. In addition to commendations from President Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles, Mrs. Luce also received numerous civic awards for her contributions in the field of diplomacy.

She is a tried diplomat. She can be expected to continue the significant work which she has heretofore performed for her country.

The other objection which has been made to Mrs. Luce was referred to by me the other day in my few remarks having to do with her statements in the heat of political campaigns relating to former Democratic Presidents. I believe the distinguished Senator from Connecticut has put this subject in proper perspective. I have raised the question as to how many Members of the Senate might be disqualified from assuming an ambassadorial post on that basis. I could think of several, if they were held too closely to their statements on the hustings.

I can think, for instance, of former President Harry S. Truman, whom I would be happy to support for ambassador to several countries I might mention—not all, but several countries. In several countries he could serve our country with distinction. It would be difficult, and quite unrepeatable here in the Senate, to recount the remarks which he made about the junior Senator from New York in the last campaign in the State of New York. He did it, however, in the heat of a campaign. He knew that the junior Senator from New York bore him no malice, nor does he today. We must learn to forgive and forget statements which are made in the heat of political campaigns, as the Senator from Connecticut has so beautifully brought out in his fine speech today.

I do not mean to endeavor to influence the Secretary of State in suggesting the name of former President Truman as an ambassador. I use his name simply as an illustration in reverse of what the Senator from Connecticut has so wisely said today. It is an illustration in reverse which might be considered to carry this thought even farther than has been advanced by the Senator from Connecticut.

Therefore I repeat that the Senator from Connecticut has shown a definitely statesmanlike attitude in the position he has taken with regard to the nomination of Mrs. Luce. I hope her nomination will be confirmed by the Senate by a very large vote, and promptly, so that she may get on with the work, which is so badly needed, in the friendly country, our neighbor to the south, to which she has been designated to serve as our Ambasador.

Mr. DODD. I am very grateful to my friend, the very able and distinguished Senator from New York, for what he has said about Mrs. Luce and for his kind and generous remarks about me. As he was speaking, it occurred to me that involved in this question is something else which is worth considering. I have not had an opportunity to think about it deeply, and therefore I am not prepared to speak at length or well on it.

The Senator has referred to the fact that former President Truman criticized him severely in the course of his last campaign. That fact is relevant to the subject we are discussing, namely, politics. As I understand, politics, by its very nature, requires oversimplification. As a rule, a politician who spoke like a diplomat would never be elected to the Senate, in my judgment; and a diplomat who spoke like a politician could not be a diplomat.

Sometimes a person possesses unique qualities and talents which make it possible for him to be both at different times in his career. The Senator from New York made me think of our distinguished colleague from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], who has been both a diplomat and a politician. I know he was a great diplomat but he certainly must have been a good politician too, to be elected as a Republican Senator in Kentucky.

That is a rare quality among us. It is, however, something we should bear in mind. That is why I sought the opportunity to speak today. I am sorry the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], whom I admire very much, is not in the Chamber. I sent him a copy of my speech, as I did to other Senators who have spoken on the subject. I believe that is the right course to follow here.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I agree with everything the Senator from Connecticut has said, except that I am not at all certain the combination of qualities which he mentioned is rare in the Senate. I can think of a great many Members of this body who have campaigned just as hard as I know the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] must have campaigned, but who in a diplomatic post would understand that their functions were different from those of a U.S. Senator.

I share the political observations of the Senator from Connecticut, but I hope that by the use of the word "rare" he does not in any way prejudice the opportunities afforded to Members of this body to serve as Ambassadors if that great challenge should ever be presented to them.

Mr. DODD. Of course I do not. Perhaps "rare" was too strong an expression; perhaps I should have said "unusual." In any event, I thought the point was worth noting.

Mr. President, this is an important subject. I have thought seriously about it. I did not make my speech lightly. Mrs. Luce lives in my State. She is a member of the opposition party. She is a woman of great influence, and is widely respected.

The thought occurred to me: What would I have done? I do not pretend to advise other Senators how they should act. Perhaps it is good to talk about this matter a little. Suppose someone comes before us as an ambassadorial nominee, concerning whom I have received complaints. I think I would write to the nominee and say, "I have received complaints. I would like to have you give me an answer to them in writing."

After I received the answer, if I were not satisfied with it, I think I would then say to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations: "I have received these complaints. I have asked the nominee to give me an answer, which he has done. But I am not satisfied with the answer. However, I am conscious of the fact that this person may go to such and such a country as our Ambassador. I think we should have an executive session in which I can pose these complaints and fully and freely inquire about the nominee's views and more specifically receive his answers."

I know the junior Senator from New York and many other Members of this body besides myself have deplored public hearings in which private citizens are called before congressional committees and are badgered and dragged around, causing unfavorable publicity to attach to them. Here is a place to apply the policy which we share, and as to which I think, with respect to diplomatic appointments, we should be more careful than we are in some other areas of investigation. If we have received a complaint which we are not certain is justified, then I think, with respect to nominations for diplomatic appointments, the matters should be aired in executive session first.

Although I believe the Senate will confirm the nomination of Mrs. Luce—and I believe it should—already her high reputation as a diplomat has been injured to some extent in Brazil. I hope that if any injury has been done, it is small, because the nature of the inquiry which took place in the Committee on Foreign Relations was personal and did not relate to her ability to be our Ambassador to Brazil. I hope we can get away from such considerations. I hope we can get away from merely political inquiries. I hope we can conduct ourselves better with respect to diplomatic field. This does not mean that we need to give up or sacrifice in any way a vigorous ability to contend about issues; it simply means with respect to persons and their reputation and standing at home and abroad that we should be more careful, courteous, and considerate in the interest of the people of this country and in the interest of our neighbors.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I think yesterday's action by the Senate, when the nomination of Secretary of State Herter was confirmed with a convincing unanimity, represented a very splendid hour in this body. I congratulate the junior Senator from Connecticut for his forthrightness in speaking out today on the nomination of a very gallant, talented, and distinguished American woman whom the President has seen fit, for the second time, to nominate to be the representative of our country abroad.

This is not the first time in the few years I have sat in the Senate when some Senators have objected to ambassadorial nominations of President Eisenhower. In the first few months of my tenure, some of my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle saw fit to object and object violently to a distinguished American whom the President had nominated to represent our country in Moscow. But when the roll was called, the nomination of Ambassador Bohlen was confirmed—and confirmed overwhelmingly.

I have no doubt that what the able junior Senator from Connecticut, a Democrat, has said concerning this nominee of the President of the United States, who is a Republican, will be the overwhelming position of the Senate, and that once again the Senate will have demonstrated to the American people, and, beyond them to the world, that in the realm of foreign relations, partisanship is not the rule.

The old shibboleth still obtains: Politics in America stops at the water's edge.

Mr. DODD. I thank my very good and distinguished friend, the Senator from California, for his kind remarks.

A BRIGHT ECONOMIC FUTURE WITHOUT INFLATION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, yesterday I placed in the RECORD a speech which Secretary of the Treasury Robert Anderson had made in New York City the day before.

The Wall Street Journal of today has published two editorials which emphasize the important significance of some of the points which Secretary Anderson made in his very able speech.

For the information of Senators and all others who read the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that the two editorials be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LONELY VOICE

It is impossible to read Treasury Secretary Anderson's speech, parts of which we print on this page today, without a sense of the man's deep convictions. Also it is difficult to put up a logical quarrel with what he says.

Yet the ironic fact is that this voice of sanity is all but alone and is little heeded in this supposedly practical Nation. Even his own administration is not fully following his counsel. As for those who control Congress, many of them deny what he sees as the realities of our time and busy themselves with the propagation of untruths.

Some of the more glaring of these untruths Mr. Anderson calmly and rationally exposes. They constitute the heart of the spenders' case in their current battle against balacing the budget in the next fiscal year and future years.

One is the notion that a little inflation is good for economic growth. This, as the Secretary suggests, is absurd on the face of it, for inflation distorts the economic structure and "exacts a penalty that would be levied on the pocketbook" of every American. "So long as our aim is to increase real wages and real goods and services, I do not believe that any characteristic (inflation) which could contribute to the debasement of the currency is a desirable ingredient in our economy."

A related false assumption Mr. Anderson tackles is that Federal deficit financing has little to do with inflation. "The fact," he observes, "is that when the Government has to borrow from commercial banks * * * such borrowing adds to the money supply * * * and increases inflationary pressures. Continued deficits are bound to add to monetary inflation." And he notes that this type of financing is almost the same in effect as if the Treasury were out of money and "I called down to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and said, 'Please print me up $100 million (or whatever) worth of greenbacks'."

The truth being thus available, why do so many deny it? There is undoubtedly a good deal of confusion in the minds of some politicians, economists and people generally about the nature and effects of inflation. And because inflation at the moment seems dormant, it is comfortable to forget the future consequences of what the spenders are trying to do now.

But beyond that stands the unhappy fact that many politicians believe they have a vested interest in inflation or in the things they cannot do without inflation. They believe their political existence rests on a constant proliferation of Federal handouts to all and sundry. Since at the same time they judge it not politically astute to require more taxes—that would show the people the enormous cost of the largess—they choose the easy way of inflationary deficits. And inflation itself can for a while create a boom, deceiving people into thinking they are experiencing sound economic growth.

For such reasons inflation all too often seems politically irresistible. Unfortunately there are also politicians who see in inflation a means to still other ends—to the direct Government controls through which, as Mr. Anderson warns, we would be forced to surrender many of our freedoms.

The political explanations for the addiction to inflation do not, however, make inflation's evils any less. In this country the sum of political conflict in the past has generally been responsible Government; the danger today, greatly aggravated by the great growth of the size and power of Government, is that we may be letting politicians abdicate their responsibilities. And, in Mr. Anderson's words, unless each generation has the wisdom, courage and toughness to accept the responsibilities which are uniquely its own, "the generations that follow will surely and inevitably pay the price."

It must be more than a little frustrating for Secretary Anderson as he pursues his lonely endeavor of talking sense at a time when many will not listen. But we hope he continues to do so every chance he gets, for there is still no way to check the spread of untruth except by the truth.

PAYMENT TOO LONG DEFERRED

In the same speech Mr. Anderson says it would be immoral to postpone payments on the national debt in times of prosperity like the present.

This forceful comment is especially needed right now, when the debt seems headed toward the fantastic figure of $300 billion or more and when such basic values as thrift and fiscal morality are under concerted attack. Still, the practical prospects for debt reduction in the near future are hardly promising.

Even if Congress were to approve President Eisenhower's fiscal 1960 budget as submitted, the surplus would be less than $100 million, which is far too small to make any but a token cut in a debt of this magnitude. And anyway, the dominant faction in Congress seems determined to unbalance the budget, stockpiling still more deficit and debt to fuel still more inflation.

It is clear, then, that the administration has not done as much as it should have to provide for debt reduction, and that a great many members of Congress have simply lost touch with the realities of national finance.

So the importance of achieving a balanced 1960 budget, even with a microscopic surplus, is not that it would work any wonders; rather, it would be a holding operation and a sign that Congress was coming to its senses. Thereafter it would be up to the Executive and Congress to make sharp reductions in Government spending, so that it would be possible to run sizable surpluses and achieve significant cuts in both the debt and the oppressive level of taxation.

Somehow this is what has got to be done. And that is why the budget issue could mark a turning point in our national life. Mr. Anderson has stated the issue plainly: Either we return to the precepts of financial discipline, or we abandon ourselves to the ruinous immorality of inflation.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I wish to ask whether overnight he has had an opportunity to study my amendment, and I wish to know whether he has reached a decision to accept it or to propose to it an amendwhich could be accepted.

Mr. KENNEDY. The first part of the amendment is satisfactory. I wish to study a little more the effect of the part which reads as follows: "any member of a board, council, committee or other body authorized to exercise governing or executive functions," and so forth.

Is the Senator from Arizona calling up the amendment at this time?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I shall discuss it briefly; or, if the Senator from Massachusetts has decided to accept the amendment, I shall merely request that my statement on the amendment be printed at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to study the amendment in a little more detail.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Very well.

Mr. President, let me state that I have had placed on the desk of each Senator a brief statement entitled "Definition of Union Officer."

Mr. President, this amendment, which is identified as "4-17-59—BB, would insert on page 51, between lines 11 and 12, the following new subsection:

( ) "Officer" of a labor organization means any constitutional officer, any member of a board, council, committee, or other body authorized to exercise governing or executive functions with respect to such labor organization, or any official or employee of a labor organization, regardless of how selected, who exercises or is authorized to exercise any governing or executive functions in such labor organization, and includes, but is not limited to, organizers, business agents, regional directors, managers, and trustees of subordinate labor organizations as well as officials designated as or performing the functions of president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer of a labor organization.

Mr. President, on the desk of each of my colleagues is a statement which I wish to read. It is brief, and is as follows:

DEFINITION OF UNION "OFFICER"

Sec. 501(k): This amendment adds a new subsection to the committee bill providing a definition of the term "officer."

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that a union's "officers" are only those officials of the union who are so designated by the union's constitution, regardless of the function that the official performs. Further, it is the established doctrine of the National Labor Relations Board, uniformly upheld by court decisions, that a labor union can satisfy all the requirements of the definition of "labor organization" contained in the Taft-Hartley Act without having a single officer.

The committee bill repeatedly uses the terms "officer" and "employee" of a labor union, without defining these terms. However, the prohibition in the committee bill against having ex-convicts hold union office extends not only to service as an "officer" but also to director, trustee, member of an executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, organizer, or other employee of a labor union. It is clear, therefore, that the term "officer" as used in the committee bill does not include any of these officials.

This amendment defines the term union "officer" to mean the president, vice president, secretary, treasurer and also includes within its meaning any officials and employees who perform the function of an officer regardless of the manner in which they are selected. Included in the definition of union "officer" would be those officials or employees who serve as a member of a board, council, committee, or other body authorized to exercise governing or executive functions with respect to such union, organizer, business agent, regional director, manager, and trustee of a subordinate local union.

Unless this amendment is adopted, the sanctions and prohibitions directed against union "officers" will apply only to the "officers," if any, so designated in the union constitution.

Mr. President, throughout the committee bill, there are repeated references to the term "officer," and yet the bill fails to include a definition of a union officer.

Why is it so important for the bill to contain a definition of union officer? The U.S. Supreme Court has held that a union's officers are only those officials of the union who are so designated by the union's constitution, regardless of the function the official performs. Further, it is the established doctrine of the National Labor Relations Board, uniformly upheld by court decisions, that a labor union can satisfy all the requirements of the definition of labor organization contained in the Taft-Hartley Act without having a single officer. It can deal with an employer concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment without having a president, or a secretary, or a treasurer, or any other officer. In other words, a group of employees, as a result of a purely informal, almost casual, discussion at lunch, can decide to ask their employer for a raise, or a holiday, or an improvement in the heating system, or to correct a grievance. They have no formal or permanent organization, no constitution, no bylaws—and no officers. Nevertheless, they are a labor organization, not only under the Taft-Hartley Act, but under the committee bill as well.

The sanctions contained in the committee bill against union officers for failure to file required information or for violating other provisions of the bill are exclusively criminal, subjecting the officer to imprisonment or a fine or both. If a union were to rewrite its constitution to designate only the president, for example, as an officer, all other officials of the union even though they may perform the functions of officers, would not be subjected to these criminal sanctions, since they are not designated as officers by the union constitution, and hence are not officers under the decision of the Supreme Court. Thus, in the absence of a definition of union officer, the only sanctions against misbehaving union officials in the committee bill are in large measure rendered a nullity.

If we go through the various titles of the committee bill it becomes plain how the lack of a union officer definition would allow the crooks, racketeers, and goons in the union movement to continue their nefarious activities without the slightest fear that the committee bill will put them out of business, as its sponsors have proclaimed.

Section 102 requires every officer of a union to file with the Secretary a report listing and describing any benefit that the officer received from six different conflicts of interest in which the officer may be involved. As will be pointed out later in this debate, this does not cover every type of conflict of interest in which an officer may be involved. Failure to file the required information is made a crime. But if the union constitution, for example, designates only the president as its officer, or, as could conceivably happen, does not designate any officers at all, each and every official of the union, regardless of the fact that they actually perform the functions of an officer, would not be required to report their conflicts of interest under the committee bill. However, if the amendment defining union officer is adopted, the crooks and racketeers who perform the functions of officers would be compelled to report on their conflicts of interest or else be in violation of the bill. Naturally, the provisions of the committee bill requiring the preservation of the books and records on which the conflict of interest reports are based would not apply to these officials, since they would not be officers within the meaning of the bill, and therefore would not have to report in the first place.

Section 107(a) prohibits a union from making any loans to any of its officers which result in a total indebtedness to the union on the part of the officer in excess of $1,500. Similarly, this provision places no burden upon those officials not designated as officers by the constitution. The union can lend them unlimited sums of money without in any way violating this provision of the committee bill. Resorting to the loan type of operation for bleeding the union treasury dry is a favorite device of the racketeer. Many illustrations of this type of operation have been uncovered during the McClellan committee investigations. Unless a definition of union officer is added to the bill, this type of dishonesty will continue unabated.

Section 109 makes it a Federal crime for any person to embezzle the assets of a union of which he is an officer. Such officer, upon conviction, may be sued by a union member in order to recover the embezzled union funds. Now, if the constitution designates the president only, for example, as a union officer, the whole section would be inapplicable to all the other officials of the union, even if they perform the functions of officers but are not designated as such by the union constitution. This means that the treasurer of a union, not being an officer since he is not so designated by the union constitution, could actually embezzle money from the union treasury and escape the criminal penalties of this section. Furthermore, since he is not an officer, no suit may be brought by a union member to recover the funds stolen by him. As far as the committee bill is concerned, this official would go scot free. Fortunately, our amendment adopted in committee preserves State remedies in this field. Save for that, the committee bill, lacking a definition of union officer, would have punched a gaping loophole in our criminal statutes against embezzlement. As it now reads, the committee bill's provision is meaningless.

Section 112 requires every officer of a union and every employer to file a non-Communist affidavit with the Secretary. The committee bill repeals the non-Communist oath provision in the Taft-Hartley Act and requires every employee, as well as every officer of a labor union, to file a non-Communist affidavit as part of the reporting requirements. This provision takes us back to where we started. The Supreme Court decision holding that the term "officers" includes only those officials who are so designated by the union constitution, was handed down in a case involving a union official who had not filed a non-Communist affidavit. Since the official was not designated an "officer" in the union constitution, the Supreme Court held that he was not an "officer" and therefore did not have to file the affidavit. So once again, the committee bill, by failing to define the term "officer," now lets Communist union officials, as well as crooks and racketeers, off the hook where those officials are not designated as officers in the union constitution.

Nor is the trusteeship title of the committee bill any more free of this fatal officer ailment, which can so easily be cured by the adoption of my amendment defining the term "officer." Section 201(a) requires trusteeship reports to be signed by the parent union president, treasurer, or corresponding principal officers, as well as the trustees. Here it is not enough that we do not know or cannot ascertain who is an officer; we now do not know who is a corresponding principal officer. If the union has a president and treasurer, then they must sign the trusteeship report. However, if the union does not have a president and a treasurer—and bear in mind that it is established Board doctrine that a union does not have to have any officers—then the corresponding principal officers must sign the report. If the union constitution does not designate any officers, who is there to sign the trusteeship report? Recognizing that the committee bill lacked a definition of officer, we pressed for, and obtained in committee, an amendment requiring that the trustees of the subordinate union must sign the report in order to insure the signing of the report by at least someone in authority.

If the lack of a definition of union officer has wreaked havoc with the reporting and trusteeship titles of the committee bill, it reaches the apex of its destructive powers when we arrive at the election title.

This title sets forth requirements imposed upon unions with respect to the election and removal of officers. What officers are to be elected and what officers are to be removed? Only those officers who are so designated by the union constitution. For example, a local union constitution specifies a single officer, the president. His election to and removal from office must take place in accordance with the requirements of this title. But the election and removal of all other officials of the union, even though they may perform the functions of officers, are not subject to the provisions of the committee bill. It is readily apparent that, once again, the lack of a definition of union officer in the committee bill comes like a breath of fresh spring air to the crooks, racketeers and mobsters who have infested the union movement. They were told that this bill would drive them out of the unions once and for all. But their old friends, the lack of a definition of a union officer, has saved the day for them.

One very interesting point is raised in the election section—section 305(a)(b)—prohibiting persons, convicted of certain crimes or violations of the reporting and trusteeship titles, from holding union office.

Suddenly the committee bill becomes very specific. The prohibition extends not only to service as an officer but also to service in the positions of director, trustee, member of the executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, or organizer. If, as the proponents of the committee bill tell us, there is no need for a definition of union "officer," then why is it necessary to spell out each and every official position in the section prohibiting criminals to hold union office. Mere consistency would dictate that these same official positions should be spelled out elsewhere in the committee bill. By citing all these official positions, in addition to the term "officer," the proponents of the committee bill leave no doubt in my mind that they too recognize that officials of a union, although performing the functions of officer, may not be officers unless so designated by the union constitution.

One final point should bear discussion. In various sections of the committee bill we find the terms "constitutional officer," "corresponding principal officers," and "principal financial officer." These terms make it doubly confusing for anyone to comprehend the committee bill. Do the proponents of the committee bill mean that there are two or three or four types of officers? Are the officers who have to report under the conflict of interest section the same as the constitutional officers which the union must list in its report under section 101(a)? And if they are not the same, how do they differ? These are questions which only the proponents of the committee bill can answer.

Mr. President, it is, I believe, perfectly clear that this bill suffers from many serious defects, the lack of a definition of union officer being one of the most important. I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I want to see how long this victory lasts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the amendment I had offered was voted upon by two Members. I should like to glory in a victory, but not one of that rather dubious nature. Therefore, I ask that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BUSH. Is the Senator asking unanimous consent that the Senate reconsider the vote?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate reconsider the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I express my appreciation to the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona, briefly, what the effect of his amendment would be.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am sorry the chairman of the subcommittee was not present when I presented my statement. The effect would be to define "officer." There is no definition of "officer" in the bill. The Supreme Court has held that union officers are only those officials of the union who are designated by the union's constitution, regardless of the functions which any particular official performs.

Moreover, it is the established doctrine of the National Labor Relations Board, formally upheld by the courts, that a labor union can satisfy all the requirements of the definition of "labor organization" contained in the Taft-Hartley Act, without having a single officer.

I may say to my friend from Massachusetts that the committee bill repeatedly uses the term "officer" or "employee," but there is no definition of the term "officer" anywhere in the bill. There is one section which applies to criminals holding office, and the offices which criminals may not hold are listed.

I merely wish to bring the bill into consistency, and eliminate a major source of loopholes which I feel exists in the bill by reason of its failure to define "officer."

Mr. KENNEDY. I think the problem is that we do not know whether the effect of the Senator's amendment would be to require the various personages named in the amendment to be subject to election.

Mr. GOLDWATER. No. That requirement applies only to constitutional officers. We propose to retain the language in the bill, but we wish to define the term "officer." Every other term used in the bill is defined.

Mr. KENNEDY. How does the Senator define "officer"? Is a member of all the governing bodies and executive committees an officer?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The ones I have listed in the amendment are president, vice president, trustees, organizers, and so forth. They do not have to be elected, unless the constitution so provides. We do not propose to change that portion of the bill. What we are trying to do is to define the term "officer," so that when the bill mentions "officer" we shall know what is meant.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act and under the rulings of the courts, the Senator and I might go to lunch and decide to bargain with our employer, assuming that we were not working for the Federal Government. We would be a "labor organization." We would have no officers, but under the law we would be a labor organization. As a labor organization we would not have to report to the Secretary of Labor under the provisions of the Senator's bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it would define the term "officer." Is that correct?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me read the amendment:

( ) "Officer" of a labor organization means any constitutional officer, any member of a board, council, committee, or other body authorized to exercise governing or executive functions with respect to such labor organization, or any official or employee of a labor organization, regardless of how selected, who exercises or is authorized to exercise any governing or executive functions in such labor organization, and includes, but is not limited to, organizers, business agents, regional directors, managers, and trustees of subordinate labor organizations as well as officials designated as or performing the functions of president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer of a labor organization.

Mr. KENNEDY. I invite the attention of the Senator to section 112, on page 29 of the bill, in regard to non-Communist affidavits. Would that mean that all the persons the Senator has enumerated would have to file a non-Communist affidavit?

Mr. GOLDWATER. We could make an exception. Under the language of the Senator's bill, I am afraid there could be unions with respect to which there would be no requirement to sign a non-Communist oath.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator think there would be difficulty in determining who was an officer and who was an employee?

Mr. GOLDWATER. With respect to the non-Communist oath, in the Coca-Cola case the Court held that the union in question not having designated any officer, even though there were those performing the functions of officers, therefore the union did not have to file a non-Communist oath.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 51, between lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

(R) "Officer" of a labor organization means any constitutional officer or in the absence of constitutional officers any persons performing the functions of a president, vice president, and secretary-treasurer of a labor organization.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I hope the substitute will meet the problem which concerns the Senator from Arizona. It would be possible to remove from that category someone who was really a governing figure in a union, and who was performing the functions of president, vice president, secretary, or treasurer, by redefining his title under the provisions of the act.

I believe the point the Senator has brought out is important, but I believe that his amendment is too broad. The substitute provides that the person performing the particular functions, as well as the person named in the constitution, shall be covered by the act.

The Senator and I perhaps disagree as to how far definitions should go. I believe that the substitute meets the problem involved in the Coca-Cola case. It would be an improvement in the present pending bill. Even though we do not go as far as the Senator would like to go, he might be willing to accept the substitute. I do not believe that the language the Senator proposes would be suitable.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me say to the Senator that section 305(b), on page 43 of the committee bill, very completely spells out what I am trying to spell out. Let me read:

(b) No person who, after a hearing on a written record, is determined by the Secretary to have failed to file any information required by title I or title II, after written notice by the Secretary directing him to file and no person who has been convicted of any violation of title I or title II shall serve as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, international representative, manager, paid organizer, or other paid employee of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce for a period of 5 years after such determination by the Secretary or such conviction. No labor organization or officer thereof shall knowingly permit any person to assume or hold any office or paid position in violation of this subsection.

I cannot find any consistency between the attitude of the Senator in wanting to be broad in the definition of "officer" and his desire to be extremely explicit and definite in section 305(b), when we are talking about criminals.

The Senator knows full well that we have found abundant evidence in the McClellan committee of wrongdoing on the part of organizers and international representatives, business agents, and so forth.

If we do not close the loopholes, unions can crawl through them by the constitutional means recognized by the Supreme Court. I merely wish to tighten the provisions of the bill. I feel that if we accept the Senator's substitute for my amendment, and include only constitutional officers, and, specifically, president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer, we leave the next echelon of officials free to do anything they wish to do.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not agree with the Senator. I think they are covered, either as officers, or those performing the functions of officers, or as employees.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I cannot agree with the Senator, because there is no definition of "cfficer" in the bill. Every other term is described and defined. We do not quite fully describe the term "labor organization." We will get to that in a later amendment. "Employees" and others are defined. Why can we not include a definition of "officer" such as my amendment suggests?

Let us be complete about it. In the McClellan committee investigations we found more wrongdoing among business agents, organizers, and international representatives than we found among presidents, vice presidents, and treasurers. I believe that without this amendment, as I have worded it, the bill will be full of loopholes through which these people will conveniently and quickly be able to crawl. I am ready to vote on the amendment. First I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] are absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the Kennedy amendment to my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I oppose the Kennedy amendment to my amendment. I do not believe it closes the loopholes which now exist in the committee bill.

The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would not require business agents, organizers, international representatives, members of executive boards or councils, or trustees of locals, to comply with many of the provisions of the bill. It is among that group in the labor unions that most of the bad acting was found. There has not been too much trouble with presidents, vice presidents, and treasurers of locals. The trouble has been found in the lower ranks, among the persons whom I have mentioned, persons who would be exempt under the Kennedy amendment to my amendment.

The Senator from Massachusetts has offered an amendment which reads, in part:

"Officer" of a labor organization means any constitutional officer—

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the constitution of a labor organization does not have to name an officer; that a labor organization does not have to have officers at all.

The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts continues—or, in the absence of constitutional officers, any persons performing the functions.

Yet in the bill there is no definition of "functions" or no reference to "functions."

I feel, therefore, that the Kennedy amendment to my amendment is completely inadequate. It would not close the loopholes which I have disclosed exist in S. 1555 at present. I urge that the Senate vote against the Kennedy amendment. Then I shall ask for a yea-and-nay vote on my amendment, which I feel will completely close the loopholes in the Kennedy bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Is it not true that the Kennedy substitute would not, in fact, add anything to the definition of "officers," in that it does not meet the problem which has been raised by the Senator from Arizona, namely, that any union could simply, by its constitution, provide for either one officer or no officer, and thereby escape all the provisions of the bill?

Will the Senator from Arizona address himself to that question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I certainly agree with the Senator's contention.

The substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] would require, as a maximum, only three officers—namely, president, vice president, and secretary-treasurer. There might be four officers; but, as the substitute has been worded by the Senator from Massachusetts, it calls for only three.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield further, let me call his attention to the fact that New York State has enacted the first law of its kind, I believe, which safeguards union funds and eliminates financial abuses, whether practiced by labor or management. Among the definitions included in that law are those of "officer" and "agent"; and all the way through that law we find references to "officers" and "agents."

However, the bill now before the Senate, as I understand, refers only to "officers," and does not use the word "agent." Is that correct?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from New York is absolutely correct. Furthermore, although the pending bill refers to "officer," it does not include a definition of "officer."

Mr. KEATING. The New York State statute defines "officer" as any person holding or in fact performing or authorized to perform the functions of an office named or described in the constitution, charter, articles of incorporation, articles of association, or bylaws of a labor organization or employer organization.

The New York State law then defines "agent" as any person, other than an attorney engaged in the practice of law, who represents or is authorized to represent a labor organization or employer organization, wholly or with others, in its dealings with employers, employees, members, employer organizations, labor organizations, or other persons, regardless of whether his relationship to the labor organization or employer organization is that of an independent contractor or employee.

If the pending bill included a provision sufficiently broad to cover all those categories, then I take it the Senator from Arizona would not object to the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would not object too strenuously. I believe that in the Federal law we should perhaps go a little further than the New York State law goes—and let me say that I have great admiration for the State of New York for passing that law. I believe the Federal law should spell out the definition of these officers, and should define the word "officer" in line with the language of my amendment.

I do not believe it sufficient merely to use the words, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] would suggest, "a constitutional officer," because in the Coca-Cola case the Supreme Court held that a union constitution does not have to have "officers" spelled out in it. In fact, under the law a union organization needs no officers to exercise its prerogatives.

Furthermore, if we adopt the language of the Kennedy substitute, we adopt the words "in the absence of constitutional officers, any persons performing the functions of a president" and so forth.

Well, Mr. President, what are the functions of a president? What are the functions of a vice president, a secretary, or a treasurer? I think we have those functions in mind; but they are not spelled out. Furthermore, in the McClellan committee hearings we found that many of the union presidents, vice presidents, secretaries, and treasurers were doing things that would not be the function of the president, the vice president, the secretary, or the treasurer of any corporation with which I am connected.

So I believe it necessary that the Senate adopt the language I have proposed.

Mr. KEATING. Furthermore, under the substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, if the union constitution provided for a single officer, he would be the only one who would be covered by the bill; and it would be only in the absence of such a provision that the bill would cover three officers.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from New York is absolutely correct.

Mr. KEATING. Would not that result in a possible loophole for an ill-intentioned union that desired to do improper things? Would not that be a definite loophole—when the union simply named one officer, and then had the improper activities conducted by one of the unnamed officers?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is the type of loophole I have described, which exists under the titles of the pending bill, S. 1555.

Mr. KEATING. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona is sound and should be adopted.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Under the Kennedy substitute, would business agents be covered by the bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No.

Mr. MUNDT. As the Senator realizes, as a member of the McClellan committee, and as is realized by every American who has even a casual acquaintance with the evils which have been disclosed by the McClellan investigating committee, a great many of these problems involve the business agents. So, if we exempt the business agents, we might just as well forget about any reform legislation whatsoever. The notorious man by the name of Baker, who appeared before our committee, and then took the fifth amendment, and then took recourse to going to a hospital, because of either real or imaginary ills, and has never returned from the hospital, is a business agent. In case after case after case, the worst thugs or crooks were business agents. So there is no use in attempting to accomplish any of these reforms if we exempt business agents, and say that they are not included in the correctives to be provided by the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The bill contains a title which deals with trusteeships. Would a trustee who was designated for a subordinate labor union be an officer under the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But I think it vital that such a person be designated an officer, under the provisions of the bill, because such a person performs many functions on the basis of having been designated by the parent body. Yet he would have no responsibility as an officer unless he was included in the definition of officer.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. President, the substitute would not include organizers, business agents, regional directors, managers, and trustees of subordinate labor organizations, as well as officials designated as or performing the functions of president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer of a labor organization.

In section 102(a) of the bill, which deals with conflict of interest, those who are required to report are only union officers and union employees; and officers need not be union employees. So this proposal is gimmicked in such a way that there is a hole which is so large that all of Jimmy Hoffa's Teamsters could be driven through it.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. Is it not a fact that the Kennedy substitute is so worded that a union would need only select or elect the officers named in the substitute, or even only the one officer; and then it could name countless numbers of others to serve in any capacities desired, or they could be called anything that was desired, and in that way they would be able to violate the law with immunity?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is my understanding that what the Senator from Colorado has said is absolutely correct.

Mr. ALLOTT. Is it not true that the proposed Kennedy substitute would not include trustees named by a union itself under section 302(c) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which, as the Senator from Arizona recalls, is the section which provides for the joint administration of benefit and welfare funds? Thus, the section would not cover such trustees, even though they had been named by the union itself.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Not unless they were designated as an officer, as my amendment intends.

Under the language of the Kennedy substitute, they would not be officers, and would not have to report.

Mr. ALLOTT. Not unless they happened to fall within the specific category he has named.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes, or unless they were provided for by the union's constitution; and we cannot require union constitutions to provide for that.

Mr. President, I have nothing more to say on this subject.

I urge the Senate to reject the Kennedy substitute, and later to adopt my amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe that the Senator from Arizona unknowingly has really misstated the record in answering the questions of the Senator from New York and in answering the questions of other Senators.

The bill clearly covers, in its key provisions, such as the conflict-of-interest provision, officers and employees of a union.

In order to take care of any question which might be raised by the Coca-Cola Co. case, we have offered a substitute which provides that officers, those performing the function of officers or employees, shall be covered by the key sections of this bill. I do not know of anyone else in organized labor who should be covered by the bill.

Business agents—and this point was raised by one of the Members of the Senate—are employees of unions, and are covered by the section on conflict of interest.

I do not think it in the national interest to compel every supervisor, foreman, and all others of that sort who are employed by every corporation in the country to sign a non-Communist affidavit; but that would be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

All of those who are named in his amendment would be subject to all the provisions of the bill, and would have to sign, for example, all the non-Communist affidavits. If that is done, I shall also insist that every supervisor of every corporation in the Nation also be required to sign a non-Communist affidavit, and also that every foreman sign one; and in that way we could simply bury Washington in paper, if that is the Senator's idea.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. No; I wish to finish my statement.

Let me go through the bill section by section where references to "officers" are made.

On page 9, section 102, in which the conflict of interests is dealt with, the language reads:

> Every officer of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, and every employee of such a labor organization * * * who receives wages, salary, expenses or other allowances in excess of $5,000 * * * shall file with the Secretary a signed report.

Relating to the conflict of interest.

The substitute would add an additional definition which I am not sure is necessary, but I am glad the Senator has brought up the question. The substitute provides that every officer or one who performs the functions of a president, vice president, or secretary-treasurer shall make such a report. I do not think that leaves out anyone.

Let us go to the next section which relates to the question. That is found on page 25, line 7:

> It shall be unlawful for any labor organization, or for any person acting as an officer, agent, representative, or employee of such labor organization, to demand or accept from the operator of any motor vehicle.

This language deals with a fee for unloading. It seems to me that section is very clear.

Let us proceed to page 35 of the bill, which deals with elections. I read from line 4, section 301:

> Every national or international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, except a federation of national or international labor organizations, shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body.

If the substitute is adopted, it would make the definition extremely clear and precise. I would not want named all the persons enumerated in the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, which would be unnecessary and not called for in view of the extremely generous language which is proposed defining those officers.

The next section of the bill to which I call attention appears on page 36, line 5:

> Officers of intermediate bodies, such as general committees, system boards, joint boards, joint councils, or other associations of labor organizations as defined, shall be elected.

Once again, that is an extremely generous definition of those who ought to be elected by secret ballot.

Lastly, on page 53, line 9 of the bill, appears the following language:

> It shall be unlawful for any labor organization, its officers, agents, representatives, or employees, to fine, suspend, expel, or otherwise discipline any of its members for exercising any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act.

I am aware of the problem with which the Senator from Arizona is concerned, but I must say I think we have dealt completely and effectively with all the persons who should be dealt with in this section. If the amendment of the Senator from Arizona should be adopted, the bill would have to be rewritten from top to bottom. I think those who are officers of a union or exercising the functions of officers or those who are acting in an executive capacity are dealt with in my proposal. I hope my amendment will be adopted, and that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona will be rejected.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Why is it, that when the Senator gets into the criminal sections of the bill, he is very specific in spelling out who can and who cannot be employed by a union? I refer to section 305(b):

> No person who, after a hearing on a written record, is determined by the Secretary to have failed to file any information required by title I or title II, after written notice by the Secretary directing him to file and no person who has been convicted of any violation of title I or title II shall serve as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, international representative, manager, paid organizer, or other paid employee of a labor organization—

And so on and so on. When the bill is so specific in that regard, why can it not be specific in defining "officer," which definition does not exist in the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am delighted to answer. We have covered the definition of "officers" and "employees." We do not mean every employee in every labor organization shall be subject to the very sharp prohibition against being employed by a labor organization if he has been convicted of a felony. Therefore, we have referred to those who, in the public interest, should be denied employment in a labor organization; but we do not exempt anyone.

We use the term "officers" and "employees" in relation to conflict of interest. It seems to me that is an extremely broad inclusion. We do not want to say that no labor organization shall hire as an employee any one who has been convicted of a felony, but that he shall be prohibited from employment in certain definite, sensitive categories. That is the reason this language is used.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator referred to the fact that throughout the bill reference is made to officers and employees. I agree with him, but there is no definition of "officer." The Supreme Court has held that union constitutions do not have to name officers. I do not see how we are going to plug that loophole if a union does not have an officer, or has merely one officer. An officer does not have to be an employee of the union.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me say I think the Senator from Arizona has performed a service in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. In order that no question can be raised, we say "officers or those performing the functions of officers or employees." I think that definition is all inclusive.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Where is there to be found in the bill a description of the functions of a president, vice president, and so forth?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not think there will be any difficulty on the part of the National Labor Relations Board or of the Secretary in determining who is an officer or who is performing the functions of an officer or employee. We assume that men who are reasonable and intelligent can make a perfectly clear determination as to who those persons are. The Secretary is empowered to issue regulations in this field.

In my opinion, I think the Senator's amendment goes far beyond dealing with what may be a real problem. I think we have dealt with the problem of the Coca-Cola case, if that is the concern of the Senator from Arizona. The Senator is going away beyond that problem and making many persons in various organizations subject to many requirements, and I do not think it is necessary to set them out.

Mr. President, I have presented my case.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to engage the attention of both the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Massachusetts. Under the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts and the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, would an organizer be an officer?

Mr. KENNEDY. No; an organizer would be an employee, unless the organizer was performing the functions of an officer.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does an organizer perform the functions of an officer? It was brought out before our committee that sometimes a president is in fact nothing, and that a business organizer sometimes runs the show.

Mr. KENNEDY. In that case he is an officer or is performing the functions of an officer or is an employee. I think he comes within one of those categories.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is the question in which I am interested. I do not care if the Goldwater amendment, as such, is adopted. I want to determine whether the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts actually includes persons who exercise authority, power, and influence in the execution of the policies, affairs, and administration of a union.

Mr. KENNEDY. No.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If that be so, then I think the language is sufficient. But if the substitute does not include those persons, there should be a clarification and a definition of what an officer is.

Mr. KENNEDY. In order to establish such legislative history as it is possible to establish, I wish to say categorically it does. It seems to me the definition we have proposed completely meets the problem of those who do not hold the constitutional position of officer, but who assume directorship or leadership in an organization. It is the intention of the substitute to deal with that problem. Those who have to do with the function of the organization in an administrative or executive capacity are included. In my opinion, there can be no question about that.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The term "officer of a labor organization" means any constitutional officer. That would include those who are actually named in the constitution of the organization, I take it.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Whoever is named in the constitution—the president, vice president, and secretary-treasurer—would be included in the Senator's definition.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then it is said, "or in the absence of constitutional officers." I would strike that provision, if we want to be all inclusive. We should strike that provision and simply say, "or any persons performing the functions of the president, vice president, and secretary-treasurer of a labor organization." If we say "in the absence of" it would be necessary to put in only one name and the whole amendment would be ineffective.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There is no question about it. When it is stated, "in the absence of," it means the absence of the constitutional naming of officers. There is no reason we should squabble about this matter. We can draft language to do what apparently all of us want to do.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have listened carefully to what the Senator has said. I think the Senator is trying to do what I would regard, at least, the right thing to do in this matter; which is to make the penalty statutes and other provisions apply to the officers or to the persons who are exercising the functions of officers.

I think the point just made by the Senator from Arkansas is a sound one, namely, that the substitute, as worded, would limit its application to anyone other than the charter or constitutional officers in the case or cases where the constitutional officers were absent.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator, I think he is quite correct.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may strike out of the amendment, after the words "constitutional officer," the term "or in the absence of constitutional officers" and substitute the word "and," which would make the amendment read:

> "Officer" of a labor organization means any constitutional officer and any persons performing the functions of a president, vice president, and secretary-treasurer of a labor organization.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Even with the correction made, there are not included the very persons the McClellan committee has shown to be the worst actors in the labor movement. It would be possible to have a maximum of three officers under the proposed language.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. GOLDWATER. Please let me finish. The language does not include an organizer, international representative, and other persons acting for the union, and they are the ones who are usually elected officers of the union.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator will permit me to reply, we do use the term "every officer and employee." The men the Senator just named are employees.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No, they are not necessarily employees. I want to make clear that those men do not have to be employees in order to occupy those positions. In fact, in the course of the McClellan committee hearings we have found dozens of cases where such men are not related to the union but are performing the functions, if we want to use that word.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to address a question to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. First, I will say I completely accept and approve of the philosophy of the Senator from Arizona in offering the amendment. I believe that statement can be made with reference to the Senator from Massachusetts, for I think he also completely approves it, if I have understood his statement.

It seems to me that such sections as section 305, which applies to the service of convicted persons within the official personnel or the group of critical employees of a union organization, are ample in their designation of individuals. For instance, that particular section describes as those who are affected:

> An officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, organizer, or other employee of a labor organization (other than an employee performing exclusively clerical or custodial duties).

It seems to me that is about as general and as broad as anyone could ask.

The question I desire to address to the distinguished Senator from Arizona is this: Are there any other provisions with regard to applying penalties and restrictions because of an improper record or improper conduct on the part of individuals, to which the Senator can direct our attention, in which the wording is not sufficiently explicit to cover all the classifications of both officers and critical employees who should be included within such provisions?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. I refer to the sections covering trusteeships and conflicts of interest.

Mr. HOLLAND. What section is that?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Section 102(a), beginning at the bottom of page 8.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is the conflict of interest section.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct. The conflict of interest section is one.

The conflict of interest section requires reporting, but does not require it of the men the Senator has mentioned as being included in section 305. In other words, a part of my argument is that if the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to be explicit in section 305(b) he should be willing to be explicit throughout the bill.

We are talking about section 102(a), the conflict of interest section.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator state again the subsection to which he has referred?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have just referred to section 102(a), which begins at the bottom of page 8 and continues on the top of page 9. It is the conflict of interest section.

Mr. HOLLAND. That refers to "every officer" and "every employee of such a labor organization"——

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. "Who received wages, salary," and so forth "in excess of $5,000." Does the Senator think that wording is not sufficiently broad?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I certainly do. In addition, we have learned of many instances in which these hoodlums have been paid less than $5,000. That in itself would prove the language would provide another loophole.

It is not enough to say:

> Every officer of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, and every employee of such a labor organization.

My argument is that the Supreme Court has held the constitution of a union does not have to make any provision for officers. A labor organization can be a labor organization without having a president or any other officer. A labor organization which wanted to do so could operate without officers and would not have to report under the provisions of section 102(a). However, if we include, as my amendment provides, a definition of "officer" in the bill, then we would cover the entire bill and not simply section 305(b).

Mr. HOLLAND. Is there another section to which the Senator wishes to invite the attention of the Senate?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I refer the Senator to section 107, beginning at the bottom of page 19, of the bill. This section covers loans. It says:

> No labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall make directly or indirectly any loan or loans to any officer or employee of such organization which results in a total indebtedness on the part of such officer or employee to the labor organization in excess of $1,500.

Again, we could have the hypothetical union without an officer. Loans could be made to members, who might be assumed to be the heads of a group or to be performing some function in the organization, yet they would not have to report under the bill. Again, an officer does not have to be an employee.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator mean he thinks that provision should be extended to include the members also?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; not the members. There is another provision in the bill which refers to members and, I think, refers to loans up to $250. That is a reporting requirement in the bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator wish to refer to another section he feels is in the same category?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. I refer the Senator to page 21, section 109(b), which reads:

> When any officer or employee of any labor organization has been convicted of embezzling, stealing, or unlawfully and willfully abstracting or converting to his own use or the use of another any money or property of the labor organization in violation of the provisions of subsection (a), and the labor organization or its governing board or officers refuse or fail to sue to recover such money or property or the value of the same within six calendar months after being requested to do so by any member of the labor organization, any member of the labor organization may sue the convicted officer or employee—

And so forth. Again, who is an officer? We could have a hypothetical union, without an officer. We could have a union with one officer provided under the constitution, as called for in the Kennedy substitute, or we could have three officers, required, in the absence of a constitutional officer, in the Kennedy amendment.

Some one else would be performing the functions of responsibility of an officer, and would not have to make a report. But in the absence of a definition of "officer" it is my belief that none of the reporting sections have any validity, because unions could be so organized as to get completely around them.

Mr. HOLLAND. Are not all the various individuals listed in the Senator's amendment, other than officers, included within the scope of the word "employee"?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; not unless they are on the payroll. We found case after case in the McClellan committee hearings in which they were not on the payroll. An officer does not have to be an employee. An officer can be from another union, as we found in the most recent hearings. An officer does not even have to be related to the union actively. In many cases officers are not even members.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator have other sections in mind?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I refer the Senator to page 30, section 201, the trusteeship section. Trustees, under the Kennedy substitute, would not be officers. Nor would it be necessary for them to be officers, unless the constitution so provided.

Again, the constitution does not have to name any officer; but in the absence of them the Kennedy substitute would provide for the president, vice president, and secretary-treasurer; and yet the trustee, the man who is responsible for the union, who is actually operating the union while it is under trusteeship, would not have to make reports.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from Arizona. I was impressed, above all, by the comment made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to the effect that certain sections, including, for example, the non-Communist oath section, would be made to apply, in the event the amendment of the Senator from Arizona was adopted, much more generally, much more widely, and to a much larger group of individuals than is intended by the act. Does the Senator wish to comment upon that particular situation?

Mr. GOLDWATER. There was almost complete unanimity in the committee in favor of removing the non-Communist oath entirely, and not making it apply to either labor or management. I subscribed to that proposal. However, it did not prevail in committee, and probably would not prevail on the floor of the Senate.

I would be willing to accept amendatory language which would exclude those persons from signing a non-Communist oath, if the non-Communist oath provision remains a part of Senate bill 1555. On the other hand, if the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to do so, I am perfectly willing to extend the non-Communist oath requirement to superintendents, foremen, and so forth, on down the line. I do not believe that anyone who is a real American would object to signing a non-Communist oath.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator give an example of a case in which a man was not a member of a union, and would not be covered? The Senator stated that many cases were disclosed in the McClellan committee hearings in which persons exercised this kind of power without being members of unions. However, such a person would be subject to the provisions of the Senator's proposal.

Mr. GOLDWATER. One example is sufficient. I cite the case of Mr. Baker, who was operating as an organizer. If I remember correctly, he did not belong to any particular union.

The last case of which I have knowledge was the one involving the feather business in Chicago. We found a man who was not in the union, but who was controlling the union.

Mr. KENNEDY. No doubt Baker was on the payroll of the Teamsters Union as an organizer.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator wishes specific cases, I can submit them. I have a book full of them.

Mr. KENNEDY. I say most respectfully that I do not know what the Senator is concerned about, because it seems to me that the persons we are talking about, whom we wish to reach, are either officers, performing the functions of officers, or are employees. The Senator says that the McClellan committee hearings revealed that many persons were outside that category. As an example he cites Mr. Baker, who was an employee of the Teamsters Union.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I cannot remember the name of the man involved in the last case to which I refer. He was not officially connected with the union, yet he controlled several unions in Chicago. The case involved feather merchants.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let us be more specific. What was his function? Who was he? What was his relationship to the union?

Mr. GOLDWATER. He had no relationship to the union.

Mr. KENNEDY. He was not a member of any union?

Mr. GOLDWATER. He was a member of the Teamsters Union, but he controlled locals other than his own. All the locals in the community were beholden to him. A union not related to the Teamsters, but connected with the feather business, came under his control. I forget his name.

Mr. KENNEDY. What was his position in the Teamsters Union?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator sat through the hearings, as I did.

Let me cite one further example, that of Frank Brewster.

Mr. KENNEDY. Frank Brewster was a member of the Western Conference of Teamsters, and he was a vice president of the Teamsters Union. He would be definitely an officer. He would be completely covered by the language of the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under the terms of the Senator's bill, the Western Conference of Teamsters would not be a labor organization. That is another subject which we expect to discuss.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is wholly inaccurate. I shall be glad to read our definition of a labor organization. We discussed this question on the floor of the Senate last year. According to the language on page 51, line 5, among other things—

> A labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce—
> Includes a labor organization which—

The Senator has cited the example of Mr. Baker, who was an employee. He has cited the example of Mr. Brewster, who was an officer; and he has cited the example of an unnamed man operating among certain feather merchants.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator wishes, I shall bring to the floor of the Senate the 40 volumes of McClellan committee hearings, and refresh his memory as to these cases.

The Senator has gotten completely away from the point. For some reason or other he does not wish to include in the bill the very people who have caused the trouble, the very level of people who have been causing the trouble, according to the evidence before the McClellan committee. Those people are not included in the Senator's bill, or in his substitute for my amendment. That is the whole case.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator and I differ in that regard.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. It seems to me that what we are trying to reach is a union official, rather than an officer, who is exercising the governing authority, even though he does not preside over meetings, as would a president or vice president, does not have financial records, as a secretary-treasurer would have, and does not have administrative or membership records, as would a secretary.

I do not believe that we differ in intention. I suggest that the change which the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to make go a little further, by adding, at the end of the category he has now written, the words "or exercising governing or executive functions therein." If we did that, we would include anyone, regardless of whether he qualifies, in ultimate effect or in name, as an officer, such as a president, vice president, secretary-treasurer, or secretary. It would include everyone who actually exercises any governing or executive functions.

Let us analyze the situation for a moment. First, the only thing that would be affected would be the non-Communist affidavit. Perhaps more persons would have to file a non-Communist affidavit. I do not believe there is anything wrong with that, if, in the ultimate end, we are trying to reach those who really control the unions, and exercise governing or executive functions, although I must say I agree with my other colleagues, that we would rather have the power exercised completely. We wish to deal with the man who controls the union, whether or not he performs the functions of an officer.

The only other complication that might ensue is with respect to the question of elections. I have asked the staff which handled the bill regarding that point. This is an important point for the purpose of the legislative record. The staff confirms my view that, notwithstanding the definition of the word "officer" now in the bill, it would not be necessary to elect all these people, under the terms of the bill, and that the election is confined to constitutional officers, which is another legal definition, not this one.

Hence I believe that the Senator from Massachusetts might well accept this point, in order to satisfy the Senator from Arizona, if it will—and I hope it will—and thus meet the criteria which have been established in the McClellan committee hearings, without materially jeopardizing the bill and causing it to break down because of administrative difficulties or because of the proliferation of some papers which must be signed. I hope the Senator will give sympathetic consideration to this suggestion.

Mr. GOLDWATER. What we are trying to do is to reach the people who are actually running the union.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Would it not be better to provide "any person who performs the functions of president, vice president, secretary-treasurer, and any other executive or governing functions of a labor organization"?

Mr. JAVITS. I would not use the word "any." I did not want to use either "any" or "material." I would prefer to state simply "performs executive or governing functions."

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wonder whether the Senator from Massachusetts would accept the language suggested by the Senator from New York.

Mr. KENNEDY. I know the Senator from North Carolina wishes to speak. We would like to examine the proposed language further, to determine whether it is too far-reaching.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Arizona has rendered a signal service to the Senate in calling attention to this problem, because of the danger of a court giving a strained construction to the term "officer" if no further definition is provided.

I believe, however, that the amendment as modified by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] affords a complete answer to the problem, because it covers any person performing the functions of an executive officer. I am very much impressed by the breadth of the definition of those who are covered by the act in most cases and also by the specific nature of the definition dealing with those rendered ineligible for positions of authority by reason of their criminal records.

The bill before us is an extremely broad bill. Most of its provisions apply not only to those who are officers of unions but also to those who are employees of unions. It provides in most cases that the provisions would apply not only to officers, but to employees, except those who are acting in a custodial or clerical capacity. The relating to officers and employers words are about as broad as they can be made. They are not even restricted to employees who are exercising the powers of an agent. On the contrary, anyone who is acting on behalf of a union is included, except those who are discharging custodial or clerical duties. Where a distinction is necessary as in the case of those who have a record of criminal convictions, the bill is specific in pointing out those in exact terms it includes.

It seems to me that the amendment offered by the able and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts meets in full measure the problem to which our attention has been called by the able and distinguished junior Senator from Arizona.

While I am on the floor, I should like to commend both the junior Senator from Massachusetts and the junior Senator from Arizona for the untiring zeal and industry which they have devoted to the consideration of this proposed legislation. Both of them deserve the thanks of the Senate for their work.

Mr. KENNEDY. I wish to read the language which, I understand, the Senator from New York is suggesting:

> Except in section 112, the term "officer" means any constitutional officer, and any person authorized to perform the functions of president, vice president, secretary-treasurer, or other executive or governing functions of a labor organization.

Mr. JAVITS. That sounds all right to me.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, before a vote is had on the amendment, I believe there is one hole in the form in which the amendment is now written. It states, "president, vice president, secretary-treasurer." Under the decision of the Supreme Court, a conviction under section 302(c) has been set aside because, the Supreme Court has said, a trustee, even though elected by the union, is not an official of the union. Therefore, I would suggest, if the Supreme Court should be called upon to interpret this language, it would strictly apply it to a secretary-treasurer, and would not apply it to a secretary or a treasurer individually. I would therefore suggest that in the language we provide for "president, vice president, secretary, treasurer," and so forth. This would meet the objection I have in mind.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator suggests "secretary-treasurer, or secretary"?

Mr. ALLOTT. No; "secretary, treasurer."

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator suggests: "president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, or other executive or governing functions," and so forth?

Mr. ALLOTT. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. May we have that read again?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send the amendment to the desk and I ask that it be read. I also ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays on my amendment may be rescinded and that my substitute may be withdrawn. On behalf of myself and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], I offer an amendment as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should be very glad to have that done, as we have now solved the problem which my amendment was intended to solve. Therefore I withdraw my amendment in favor of the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and which I am glad to cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendment now offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 51, between lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

> (k) Except in section 112 the term "officer" means any constitutional officer, and any person authorized to perform the functions of president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, or other executive or governing functions of a labor organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order for the yeas and nays is rescinded, and the amendment is withdrawn.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment, as modified, was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. GORE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for his cooperation in this matter. I think that if we continue to act in the same spirit, in an effort to get our work done without acrimony and with pleasantness all around, we will end with a much better bill than we have now.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from New York.

Mr. McCLELLAN obtained the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be a quorum call without prejudice to the right of the Senator from Arkansas to hold the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on the 19th day of February, I introduced S. 1137, a bill carefully considered and designed to provide effective remedies for some of the perversion of decent unionism and flagrant exploitations and abuses that have been exposed by more than 1,200 witnesses who have appeared and testified before the Senate select committee of which I am chairman.

Subsequently, Mr. President, on March 12, I introduced four more bills—S. 1384, S. 1385, S. 1386, and S. 1387. These four bills deal with important revisions in the Taft-Hartley law, and are designed to prohibit organizational and recognitional picketing, secondary boycotts, hot cargo contracts, and the no man's land problem. The latter four measures I intend to offer as separate amendments to the pending bill.

Mr. President, at this point I may say, although I think the RECORD is already clear about it, it is not by choice that I have adopted the procedure I shall follow in offering certain amendments to the pending bill. I took the position in the beginning, and at the time the several bills on this subject were introduced, that the better legislative procedure would be to strike from S. 1555 all provisions dealing with amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, particularly title VI of the bill. That issue was resolved yesterday on the floor of the Senate by a substantial vote. Title VI remains in the bill. Title VI deals with revisions of the Taft-Hartley law. Therefore, Mr. President, all Members of the Senate who have ideas about how the Taft-Hartley law should be revised are invited to offer amendments to the bill for that purpose.

It was my considered judgment that it would be better for the Congress to consider only the first five titles of the bill, or a bill dealing with corruption and maladministration in union affairs. That is the most pressing and vital issue in the labor-management relations field at this time. Corruption wholesale is being perpetrated, maladministration and mismanagement are taking place to such an extent that in some places human beings are being virtually enslaved; and it is compelling that Congress take notice of the fact.

Rather than try to load the bill down with controversial issues, I thought the Senate should adhere to the original purpose of the bill, and try to enact legislation dealing with the problems to which I have referred; and then later consider separate legislation designed to revise the Taft-Hartley law, take up all controversial issues with respect to its revision, resolve them on their merits, and pass judgment on them according to the wishes of the majority. Unhappily, that was not done.

Whether the retention of title VI and the Taft-Hartley revisions it contains, and such amendments in that area as may now be added to the bill, will jeopardize the final passage of the bill, I do not know. But those who favor amendments or revision of the Taft-Hartley Act have no alternative but to seek to have adopted amendments which they think important when the occasion is offered for revision of the Taft-Hartley law.

It will not be the first amendment I shall offer to the bill, but the second or certainly the third amendment will be to revise certain sections or provisions of the Taft-Hartley law.

I shall either offer S. 1137—which is the original bill I introduced—as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for all of S. 1555, or I shall offer substantial provisions of S. 1137 as amendments in the nature of substitutes for certain sections and provisions of S. 1555. I shall also offer other amendments that I deem necessary to make S. 1555 a strong and effective piece of legislation, one that will get results and do the job that is needed, or as much of it as it is possible to get done by the will, consent, and approval of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I am in an unhappy situation. I had hoped that the bill reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare would be such a bill as I could support enthusiastically, without qualification or reservation. I had hoped it would not be necessary for me to offer any amendments to it which went beyond technical revisions. I had hoped amendments would not have to be offered to deal with the substance and effectiveness of the proposed legislation. Unhappily, in my humble judgment, there is not before the Senate a bill we can accept without trying our best to amend it in some vital particulars.

I have said that I believed the bill was inadequate in some areas. I find the views I hold are shared by many, many persons throughout this country. I base that statement on the letters I am receiving daily and constantly, which state in effect, "Please do something to strengthen the Kennedy bill. Please offer and fight for your own bill or bills to deal with this problem."

It would have been a matter of personal pleasure, indeed, and I would have much preferred, to defend every title, every section, and every provision of the pending bill. I would have been happy to say that it needed no strengthening and needed no revision. I would have been happy to say, "Let us forget about amending it. Let us pass it, make it law, make it effective, and get results." But when I received letters, telegrams, and telephone calls urging that the pending measure be strengthened, I had to remind those from other States who contacted me that I could not have my bills passed, that I could not amend the pending bill, that I could not fight their battles alone, and that I would have to have the help of their Senators, if I was to be successful.

There is another reason why I am taking the position I am asuming today. I have occupied a position in the Senate which carries with it what I consider to be a great honor; that is, to be the chairman of a select committee which was created more than 2 years ago and given an assignment, a duty to perform, a mission to carry out for this great body, namely, to inquire into the criminal actions and improper practices which might be going on in labor-management relations.

For some 26 months the committee has functioned, and it is functioning in the 27th month. I believe the committee has functioned effectively. I know it has functioned constantly. I doubt if in the entire history of our Government any committee has ever worked harder and produced more in the same length of time that this committee has been in existence. Certainly credit is due to the Members who compose the committee, who have in the performance of their duty been called upon to do more than perform merely the ordinary duties associated with the office of a Senator of the United States.

The evidence is recorded in many volumes of testimony. I think there are now about 45 volumes of public hearings. After hearing more than 1,200 witnesses, I believe I can say to the Senate and to the country today that the committee has produced a record, which it has brought to the Senate and to the entire Congress, and which gives the facts and the information the Congress wanted and needed so that it might be informed as to what is happening, and so that it might become acquainted with the conditions which prevail in order to legislate intelligently to remedy and to correct conditions, where such correction was indicated by the facts.

Mr. President, I say—and I say it without fear of successful challenge—that if the Senate does not now and if the Congress does not now meet its responsibility to deal with this problem effectively and to enact legislation which will get results—if it does not do it, and if it will not do it on the basis of the record the select committee has presented to the Senate—then it will not do it if we double the record. The record is available. If we do not pass appropriate legislation, and if the changes which are needed and required are not provided, I do not believe it can ever be said it is the fault of the select committee for not bringing to the Congress the information Congress needed.

Yes, Mr. President, for more than 2 years members of the select committee, Members of Congress, and the citizens of this country generally have been shocked and nauseated by the disclosures of impositions and abuses which have been perpetrated upon the working people of many of our States by the thugs who have muscled into positions of power in labor unions and who masquerade as labor leaders and as friends of working people. The forms these impositions and abuses have taken are now familiar to all of us by countless repetitions such as: The capture or purchase of local unions; the denial of democratic processes in the unions; the denial of freedom of speech and freedom of assembly by union members; the denial of the right to vote and to have any voice in the selection of officers; the denial of a voice in the formulation and adoption of policies; brutal, physical violence, vandalism, instilled fear, and economic coercion, used to silence objectors; the use in some instances of union funds to corrupt public officials; the direct extortion of money from small businessmen, who are peculiarly vulnerable to racket union shakedown tactics; the looting of union treasuries and welfare funds; the use of trusteeships for power purposes; forcible top-down organization by compelling employers to violate the legal and moral rights of their employees by delivering them under contract to the unions without their knowledge in many instances, and in others against their will and without their consent; the appointment of known criminals and unreformed convicts to positions of trust and authority over rank-and-file union members; or some combination of any or all of these practices. What I have named are not isolated instances.

Mr. President, I do not want anything in this RECORD to reflect that it is my view at all that all unions are "crooked" or that all labor leaders are "crooked." I am confident the great majority of them are honest, dedicated persons. But, Mr. President, the great majority of American citizens are also honest, dedicated persons; and yet we have laws for the protection of our people. We need in this instance laws to correct some of the conditions to which I have just referred.

The select committee's hearing record is replete with many and varied forms of such improper acts, improprieties, and even crimes against rank-and-file union members.

Yes, I think it can be said without successful challenge that two main facts emerge from the voluminous record the select committee has compiled: almost invariably the abuses, the compulsions, thievery, thuggery, skulduggery, and sometimes skull-splitting tactics are practiced against workers—certainly more often than against employers—and the arbitrary powers over workers thus acquired by such tactics almost invariably are used, or misused, for personal aggrandizement, power, and personal enrichment.

Some of the so-called unions that resort to such acts are, in fact, more like businesses operated for private profit rather than unions for the benefit and welfare of the workers. The profit is made and goes into the hands of individuals by the ruthless exploitation of workers and by the cynical perversion of unionism. Thus, the only resemblance between such corrupt unions and decent legitimate unions is that both are treated alike by the law; both have the same exemptions and privileges under the law; and both have the same unrestrained tremendous powers.

Most unions use these powers with propriety, or at least measures of restraint, but some do not. But it is the possession and the present lack of adequate regulation of these powers which invites corruption and which makes the union movement attractive in some instances and profitable for exploitation by the racketeers, the corrupt, and the unscrupulous.

No one knows how many thousands or even millions of workers are the victims of such exploitation or how many more workers may readily become victimized if effective laws are not passed to prevent it. Mark this well, however; no one is immune. The invasion of unionism by thugs and hoodlums has gone much further and is more extensive than we may think.

The Senate select committee has barely scratched the surface.

Sometimes we hear comments to the effect that the Senate select committee has looked into only about a dozen unions; that there are several hundred unions in the country, and therefore this is a small matter. That is true with respect to the number of unions, but again I assert that no doubt the great majority of unions and union leaders are honest and dedicated, but the largest and most powerful union in the country today, the one which is seeking more and more power, power paramount over that of Government itself, is beyond all doubt corrupt. There can be no question about that. More than 1½ million persons are members. Practically all of them are honest, decent citizens; but they are in a vise, and must have some relief.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I do not wish to interrupt if the Senator prefers not to have me do so.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator if the select committee did not find that in one case a man who had served a term in the Federal penitentiary at Leavenworth for impersonating a Federal officer, and who afterward had been involved in an armed robbery and had been sentenced to a term of not less than 10 nor more than 25 years in the Ohio State prison for such armed robbery, was taken out of the prison on parole, and almost immediately given a position as a business agent of a union which had been placed in trusteeship.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. The Senator has referred to one instance. That is one of the outstanding cases, but there are a number of similar instances.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator if the evidence did not further disclose that after this convicted armed robber had been placed in control, as the business agent, of the affairs of this local of the Teamsters' Union, a complaint was made to the Teamsters' Union by a number of businessmen to the effect that this man was practicing extortion upon them; that they asked the then president of the conference of the Teamsters' Union to conduct an investigation; and that the president of the conference of the Teamsters called in the convicted armed robber whom he had placed in a position of authority and asked him whether he was guilty of the charge or not; and when the convicted armed robber said he was not guilty the president of the conference of the Teamsters dismissed the subject from his mind without any further investigation, and without even having the courtesy to reply to the persons who had made the charge against his appointee?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not recall how he may have responded to those who made the complaint, but I remember that Mr. Hoffa said, "I called him in and asked him if he had done it, and he said 'No,' and that was the end of it."

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator further if it is not true that the nephew of this particular convicted armed robber was a man who became known last August as the human torch.

Mr. McCLELLAN. He and his brother, or uncle, were both taken out of prison.

Mr. ERVIN. By reason of his tragic death, resulting from an explosion while he was preparing to blow up a dry cleaning establishment, the nephew became known as the Human Torch. I ask the Senator if the evidence taken before our committee did not show that this person, the Human Torch, who had been sentenced to prison for various offenses shortly after being discharged from prison, was placed in a like position of authority in charge of another of the Teamster locals by the present president of the Teamsters' Union, Mr. Hoffa?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I believe that the man who became known as the Human Torch—I believe his name was Keirsdorf—and his uncle were both taken out of prison, paroled, and given official positions in the union, one of them immediately, as I recall, and the other shortly afterward.

Mr. ERVIN. As the Senator stated a moment ago, we found case after case of men who had been sent to prison for such serious crimes as armed robbery, burglary, extortion, and the like, subsequently being given positions of authority over honest and law-abiding, rank-and-file members of unions.

Mr. McCLELLAN. We found that to be true in many instances—so many that it is absolutely shocking to people who have any regard for decency and for the rights of human beings.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, who is a member of the Senate select committee.

The situation is sickening. It is almost impossible to believe that some of these things are happening in America.

A moment ago I stated that the Senate select committee had barely scratched the surface. For every case that has been investigated, there are literally hundreds of complaints that the committee has not had the time and the resources to touch. They still come in. A number of them are individual cases, but others involve whole unions. Notwithstanding the fact that during the 27 months since the committee was created it has held approximately 250 days of public hearings, it has been impossible for the committee to process all the complaints. We shall never be able to get around to all of them.

We do know, however, that every worker in the country is a potential victim; every union man who is not protected by effective law which he can use against beatings and tortures and job loss as reprisals for assembling, for speaking up in meetings, for making inquiry about the financial affairs or other actions of his union or its governing body is a potential victim; every citizen of the Nation is a victim to a degree of the consequences of the spread of corruption; and the most tragic potential victim of all is the honest, decent, idealistic union movement itself. For these there is a Gresham's law of people and the bad will drive out the good if the incentive is there for the bad to move in.

A little later, at the conclusion of my remarks, I shall invite attention to some headlines in today's newspapers which will substantiate and point up effectively the conditions to which I have referred.

The workers of our country, indeed, all the people of our country, are looking to us for relief. They are looking to us in the Congress to do something about this evil, and they are looking to us for relief from the evils associated with these parasites upon unionism.

They are entitled to effective relief. If we give these evils only superficial treatment and do not apply an adequate remedy as the chosen representatives of the American people, we will have been derelict in duty and failed in our responsibility. They have a right to expect, and we are under obligation to produce, something better than the illusory word "reform" as a cure for the ills that we know exist.

Mr. President, I do not believe that racketeering, corruption, abuse of power, and other improper practices on the part of some labor organizations can be, or will ever be, prevented until and unless the Congress of the United States has the wisdom and the courage to enact laws prescribing minimum standards of democratic process and conduct for the administration of internal union affairs. I mean by that, Mr. President, that the Congress should prescribe and define by law what the rights of union members are, place in them by democratic process the power to secure those rights, and protect them in their efforts to do so from reprisals of any kind from their would-be exploiters, manipulators, and bosses. Without such protection, other provisions of law may be of little benefit and meaningless. Without such protection in the exercise of his legitimate rights, the records of our committee's investigations show over and over again that a rank-and-file member dare not risk any opposition to a corrupt or autocratic leadership. If he does so, he may be beaten, his family threatened, his property destroyed or damaged, and he may be forced out of his job—all of these can happen and have happened.

Having these things in mind, Mr. President, I introduced S. 1137 to provide a bill of rights for working people—for union members. If this bill should be enacted into law, it would bring to the conduct of union affairs and to union members the reality of some of the freedoms from oppression that we enjoy as citizens by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, which incidentally does not make an exception for union members.

Sometimes the question is asked, "Why should we enact legislation protecting such rights for union members and not for members of any other organization?" I think the answer is twofold. In the first place, the justification and certainly the desirability for unionization is the fact that the individual worker in an industrial economy has little or no power, when he stands alone, to deal effectively with his corporate employer. It is through unionization and bargaining collectively that he is able to make himself heard at the bargaining table. It seems clear, therefore, that this justification becomes meaningless when the individual worker is just as helpless within his union as he was within his industry, when the tyranny of the all-powerful corporate employer is replaced by the tyranny of the all-powerful labor boss. The worker loses either way.

Second, I deem it appropriate that we insure by law internal democracy in unions and provide for proper protection of union members and their rights, because unions themselves exist and operate under powers and protection conferred by the Federal Government in a unique manner and to an unequal degree. Once a union has been certified by the National Labor Relations Board, for example, the employer is compelled to bargain with that union as the exclusive representative of all the workers within the bargaining union, irrespective of whether they are members of the union or not. If unions are to have such federally bestowed, tremendous powers in industrial government, they should be compelled by law to represent their members in accordance with democratic principles and to accord to them the basic rights of liberty, freedom, and justice.

Union members are supposed to be free men too, and they are entitled to legislative protection from autocratic rule, from personal violence, from corruption, and from threats and intimidation intended to deprive them of those rights to which they are justly entitled.

If they are protected by law, as I propose that we do, then no longer will a man have to cringe in terror because he may have spoken a word that offended a petty tyrant, or because he asked the wrong question, or because he wants to know where his dues money went.

Mr. President, one of the most salutary effects of S. 1137 would be its effect upon the quality of union leadership. The strongest support for the provision of S. 1137, and particularly the bill of rights provisions, should come from decent traditional union leaders. It will protect them from the assaults of those who would capture their unions. And I may say, Mr. President, that if present trends are not checked and if powers now in the hands of such men as Hoffa and his ilk, are not restrained—make no mistake about it—the day is swiftly approaching when that group and that element will gobble up decent unionism in this country, and the Meanys and others whom we respect and whom we feel represent the best in unionism today will be supplanted by the Hoffas, the Brennans, the Duoguardias, and men of their stripe.

When that day comes, Mr. President—and I say this in all seriousness and solemnity—we will not be here on the floor of the Senate debating whether we will provide the individual working dues-paying members with a bill of rights; when that day comes, Mr. President, we will not be here debating any issue with respect to the rights of the laboring man; those rights will have already been destroyed, and it will be too late.

Before I conclude my remarks I shall show the Senate cumulative proof to support exactly what I am saying. I am warning, with all the force at my command, my colleagues and the country that we are in danger from within from the elements about which I speak today.

In many instances the temptation of the privilege to compel men to yield him unrestrained power and personal riches attracts to the unions a certain kind of officer—the boss type. The prosaic processes of persuasion and service have little or no appeal to such a man. Why do hoodlums and racketeers and the criminal element of the type I have indicated infiltrate unions? Why do they do it? There is something there which is attractive to them. What is it? It is power. What is it? It is the opportunity to get rich by the exploitation of other men. That is what it is. We are either going to deal with it now, or, if we fail to deal with it effectively, we are not meeting our responsibility.

The type of person I have referred to has no concern for the workingman. That type of person exploits the workingman. Some of these "bosses" have businesses of their own. They threaten strikes.

That is the kind of person against whom we propose to legislate; not the good union leader; not the good union officers. Certainly if we do not legislate against the good ones, we must legislate against the bad ones, the ones who have the tendency or the temptation to commit crimes.

I believe it reasonable to expect that the removal of temptation, the ending of autocratic rule by placing the ultimate power in the hands of the members, where it rightfully belongs, so that they may be ruled by their free consent, may bring about a regeneration of union leadership. I believe the unions should be returned to those whom they were designed to serve; they should not be left in the hands of those who act as masters. The unions must be returned to their members, to whom they rightfully belong.

I do not believe that unions in our society are supposed to be, or that they should be, permitted to be the masters of the members. Unions should be the servants.

Our basic labor policy is grounded in freedom of choice. In it we sought to make effective full freedom of association, with the right assured to associate or not to associate, to participate in collective action, or not to participate, according to the free decision of each individual for himself, without either restraint or coercion from any source. That, Mr. President, is a sound policy. It is a policy that represents the rights of men and respects the dignity of man. In my judgment it is the only policy consistent with a free society.

I feel very strongly, Mr. President, that "compulsion"—one of the ugliest words of our language—is a subversion of that policy. To the extent that it is permitted to be an element of the relationship between union leaders and union members, it is a denial of basic freedoms.

I am convinced, Mr. President, based upon the observations I have made and the knowledge I have gained as chairman of the select committee that S. 1555 does not adequately meet the needs of union members for the protection of their rights. It does not afford adequate sanctuary to the exploited and the oppressed. I propose, therefore, Mr. President, to offer some strong amendments—amendments that will be in the interest primarily of workers—of union members and for their protection; amendments designed to insure greater integrity in the administration and management of union affairs. I know there are those among my colleagues who honestly think that S. 1555 is a bad bill. If they think so, then I ask that they join with me to make it a good bill. I know, too, there are those of my colleagues who honestly believe that S. 1555 is a good bill. I ask them also to join with me in these strengthening amendments so as to make it a better bill. Where the provisions of the bill make empty gestures or indulge in pleasant platitudes, let us supply amendments having words and provisions which will give this measure real force and meaning, which will make it an instrument of vitality and effectiveness—one to which decent unionism can repair, and one of which the hoodlums, racketeers, and exploiters will despair.

Mr. President, I have pointed out some of the dangers which loom large before us. I call attention to the headlines in the right-hand column of today's issue of the Wall Street Journal. I have always defended the great majority of unions and union members, including their leaders; but I warn them that they are in danger of losing that which they cherish and that which is precious to them. They ought to be joining in this fight today, urging us to pass an effective bill.

I do not propose, knowingly, to offer any amendment to the bill which I think would jeopardize, unduly restrain, retard, or hinder the progress, survival, and functioning of honest, decent unions designed to serve the workers. But I say we cannot leave unlimited and unrestricted power in the hands of the leaders, however much a great majority of them may use it wisely, because there are those in the labor movement who will not use power wisely, but will use it for the purposes of oppression, self-aggrandizement, and self-enrichment, and for the exploitation of the very people whom it is their right and duty to serve and to protect.

Senators have heard before Mr. Hoffa's threat of what he plans to do. Look at these headlines from the Wall Street Journal: "Hoffa's Combine: He Quietly, Informally Builds Potent Alliance of Transport Unions."

That is the threat he makes. Senators have heard before that he plans to form an association or a combination of all the transportation workers in the country. Into what? Into a force and a power. Who will exercise that force? Who proposes to use that power? Who will be the head of such an amalgamation? It will be Hoffa and his crony, with whom he proposes to make this alinement—Bridges, from the west coast, or someone like him—or a combination of them.

Where is the danger? I shall not take the time to read all the article, but it is spelled out on two pages.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the evidence which has been presented to the McClellan committee justify drawing the inference that James R. Hoffa, the present president of the Teamsters' Union, has more actual power today than any other man in the United States, except perhaps the President of the United States?

Mr. McCLELLAN. If he gets the power which he is seeking; if he achieves an amalgamation or establishes what he calls a conference—I care not what he names it—if he gets control of all the unions in the transportation industry in this country, he can have the Government at his mercy, and he will have it at his mercy. The Government will have to do his bidding; otherwise commerce will be stifled and industrial plants will be shut down. Someone has said he could starve a city in a few days. Is he making progress? Certainly. He blabbed his mouth, and said what he was going to do; but there was so much resentment throughout the country that he has quieted down.

But if this report of what he is doing is more than half true—and I have reason to know that it is more than half true—he has already formed an alliance or some kind of agreement with the Western Conference of Teamsters and Harry Bridges and his crowd.

Mr. President, someone has said, "You do not expect him to call a nationwide transportation strike and close down everything, do you?"

No; I would not ordinarily expect him to operate in that way. But they will play one section against another and one industry against another and one transportation power and force against another.

If he can compel the longshoremen on the east coast and those on the west coast and the workers in the airplane industry and in the trucking industry and all the others to join in the movement, who will tell me that he cannot have the economy of the Nation in his grip, to do as he pleases with it? That is the danger.

Mr. President, the danger does not come from good union members. Again I say that the Meanys and the others who today represent the best in unionism ought to be pleading with us at this very time to pass laws to deal with these matters.

Some Senators say, "Oh, well, the A.F. of L.–CIO has a code of ethics, and I do not want to criticize the bill that is before us." I am not doing so, Mr. President; it contains some good provisions. All it needs is some strengthening in certain areas, in order to make it a good and an effective bill. It will not reach all the areas I am talking about now; we shall have to deal with them on another day. But the bill will go a long way toward doing that.

But what does Mr. Hoffa care about a code of ethics? How much respect has he shown for the code of ethics of A. F of L.–CIO? It is a good code. I think we could endorse everything in it and its principle and its purpose and its objective. I have no criticism of it. But what did Mr. Hoffa think of it? Today there are a million and a half people under his domination. What does he think of that code?

In this bill we are stating that it is in the national interest for unions to develop codes of ethics on a voluntary basis. Mr. President, do you think Mr. Hoffa will pay any attention to that? Would you like to be under a code of ethics which he would formulate and under which he would operate? Based on the record, I certainly would not. That indicates how serious this matter is.

I said that I was not going to read all the article to which I have referred. Instead, I requested that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, and it will appear there.

At this point I wish to call attention to another article which appears in one of today's newspapers. Certainly it did not appear there by my design. I had not planned it; I had not thought of it; and I did not know it was going to be published. But on the second page of today's issue of the Washington Post what do we find? We find an article which refers to the fellow—Harry Bridges—with whom Hoffa has already formed some kind of alliance in the Western Conference of Teamsters.

I read from the article:

BRIDGES, COMMITTEE WRANGLE FOR 4 HOURS

Harry Bridges and the House Un-American Activities Committee wrangled for 4 hours yesterday in what set out to be a discussion of passports.

Among other things, the west coast dock workers' boss refused under the fifth amendment to state whether he was a Communist.

The article also states that he would not state whether he had gone under an assumed name.

Mr. President, just think of the many workingmen who are under the control and under the leadership and under the domination of men like that.

All my colleagues should sit on the committee with us and should see the slackers who take the fifth amendment when questioned about their stewardship for the workingmen who sweat to earn the dues they pay to these unions.

We ask them, "Do you honestly believe that if you gave a truthful answer to that question, the truth might tend to incriminate you?" They reply, "Yes."

Those are the persons we are legislating against—not the Meanys, not those who want to do right, and who are trying to lead a decent labor movement.

Mr. President, I say to you that, in my judgment, if we do not legislate as we should, the day will come when Mr. Meany and the others like him will be begging us to do something in this field.

Mr. President, do you know what the next step is, and where we shall have to go if the proposals I have made and those which I intend to make—and I regard them as the very minimum—are not put into effect? Do you know the next step that will have to be taken in order to control the Hoffas? We shall have to put the transportation unions of the country under the antitrust law; that is the only power we have left to control them.

Hoffa has said the Government cannot stop him. Mr. President, I ask my colleagues whether they are going to take that. I am not.

Mr. President, I may never come back to the U.S. Senate. The task I have been called upon to undertake has not been a pleasant one. But I would be untrue to my ideals, I would be unfaithful to the trust which has been reposed in me, I would be false and untrue to my conscience, I would be derelict in the performance of my duty, and I would give evidence of lack of courage—certainly lack of political courage—if I did not stand here today and fight and hope and pray that this great body and the Members of the other House will rise to the challenge which confronts America and, without reserve and without timidity, will strike a blow against corruption and thievery and oppression and exploitation of human beings who have to belong to unions in order to hold jobs and earn a livelihood for themselves and for their families.

Certainly this bill will do some good. But it can be made more effective, and thus do much greater good. That is what I am pleading for.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question: For more than 2 years, have not persons who occupy positions of authority in the unions which the committee has investigated come before the committee by the scores and testified, under oath, to the committee that they could not disclose to the committee anything they had done as officials of their respective unions, without incriminating themselves in the violation of some criminal law?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; that is true.

Mr. President, out of the 1,250—in round numbers—witnesses who have appeared before the commitee, 237, I believe, according to the last count—that number can vary by half a dozen either way—took the fifth amendment. I know that sometimes we are criticized for bringing them before the committee and for asking them questions. But, Mr. President, merely because a witness is going to take the fifth amendment, should he be immune from questioning about affairs so important and so vital to society, to politics, and to government? Let me say that sometimes—whether they realize it or not—they reveal much more, by cloaking themselves with the fifth amendment robe, than they would reveal even if they would answer the questions.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a statement?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to say that I have now lived a long time, and during my life I have been privileged to witness the conduct of many persons under many circumstances. I should like to bear witness to the fact that I have never known any human being to exhibit more moral and political courage than that which has been exhibited by the able and distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], as chairman of the Senate select committee.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my colleague; I thank him very much. It has not been a pleasant task. I only hope that I have in no way failed my colleagues in this body, all of whom I cherish and appreciate. Above all, I hope I have not failed my country in trying to meet and discharge the responsibilities of my position.

I can say for everyone who has served on the committee that it is only natural, as we know, to have different viewpoints; but everyone who has served on the committee, those now on the committee and those who may have retired from the committee for one reason or another, have been very, very kind to the chairman. They have been cooperative. They have been helpful. They have been sympathetic. They have been understanding.

Let me say to my colleagues with emphasis that fortunately for us, for them, and for the country, we were able to assemble a marvelous staff, employees who were trustworthy, who were industrious, who were loyal to their country, who worked long hours, when the Senator and I were sometimes at home asleep, digging out and getting the facts to inform Senators, so we might know how to legislate to deal with the evils we have uncovered.

Mr. President, I now call up my amendment numbered——

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I feel I would be delinquent unless I expressed my gratitude to the Senator from Arkansas for the very forceful argument which he has made in the Senate today. I have no question that, in the pursuit of the assignment which was given to him, he has had in mind solely the service he could render to his country and his fellow men. I pay my respects to him, in the firm belief that he has approached his responsibilities courageously.

As for ourselves, I think we shall be betraying the expectations of the people of our country unless we rise to the occasion and enact legislation which will adequately cope with the disclosures made by the McClellan committee through its investigation. There will be nothing worse we can do than to concede, by the enactment of inadequate legislation, that the Senate of the United States does not have the power and the courage to speak up, and if we thus admit that there is a power more potent than the Government itself dictating what we may do.

I do not want to be a party to the enactment of legislation for which I had to obtain the consent of powerful economic leaders in this country. I will vote for that measure which I believe is right. I am not willing to join in bringing odium upon this dignified body by saying that I will vote only for a legislative proposal to which consent has been given—not by the people, but by powerful economic leaders who threaten Members of the Senate with destruction politically unless they follow their dictates.

Thanks very much to you, Senator McCLELLAN. Whether you go down to defeat or not because of what you are espousing, time will make you big. It will make you big because you have been courageous and have not succumbed to political expediency. You have stood by what is morally right, even though it is disadvantageous to you.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my distinguished friend from Ohio. Everything complimentary he has said about me I accept in the name of each member of the committee. JOHN McCLELLAN could not do anything, the committee could not do anything, unless we worked together, trying to put the interest and the welfare of our country first, making allowances for the different viewpoints which men have in dealing with the important affairs of life.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It has been my happy privilege during my 7 years in the U.S. Senate to have served on two select committees with the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN]. The first was the one created to investigate campaigning and lobbying, and the other, of course, is the famous McClellan committee investigating labor and management practices.

I would be remiss in my duty to my conscience today if I did not tell my colleagues of my high opinion of Senator McCLELLAN. He has had two difficult jobs in a row. He has applied himself assiduously—I may say completely—to those responsibilities. He has worked far harder than has any other chairman with whom I have come in contact. I cannot recall one meeting of either of the two committees I have named when the Senator from Arkansas was not in attendance. I think he has attended every meeting of the McClellan rackets committee. He stands today on the floor of the Senate as an authority in the field we have been investigating, knowing more about it than do any of the others of us.

I join the Senator from Arkansas in paying tribute to the staff of the committee. It has as efficient a staff as I have come in contact with in the Senate. It is made up of capable, hard-working persons.

When the Senator from Arkansas expresses a doubt whether he has discharged his duties to his country in his position as a U.S. Senator, let me, as one Senator, say he has fulfilled his obligations completely; and now the weight of responsibility is on his colleagues, and not on the Senator from Arkansas. Whether the Senate passes a meaningful, workable labor bill is not up to the Senator from Arkansas; it is up to every Member of this body.

If we obey the admonition from the lips of George Meany that there are certain limitations and bounds to the kind of legislation he will accept, then I think we have reached a sad day in American history. If, instead, we listen to the arguments on the floor of the Senate, pro and con, and vote for what we believe will be the most effective legislation in the field, then as U.S. Senators we shall have discharged our duties to the people of the country.

As a Member of this body, I am very proud we have a man like Senator McCLELLAN serving in the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I join the distinguished Senator from Arizona in paying tribute to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN]. So often it happens that visitors will attend a session of the labor rackets committee and, upon leaving, will say, "How can you stand this day after day?"

I think that is significant of the difficult task which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] has performed. He has been present at and has presided over almost every session of the committee. He has been patient with all. He has given of his time and talents far beyond the demands of serving the economy and the welfare of the State of Arkansas. That service he has rendered well, but he has, in addition, rendered a service to the entire country. He has pointed up a series of problems which, if not corrected, will lead to a gangster economy in this country and will add to the inflationary trends, pushing the public interest far into the background.

The Senator from Arkansas today and in the days which will follow, as we consider the bill, will be offering amendments which are the result of mature deliberation. They are the result of listening to the testimony not merely of one side but of all sides to these controversies. Mr. President, I hope that everyone who believes in law and order and who believes in the right of working people to run their own unions, manage their own affairs, and have possession of their own property will support the Senator from Arkansas on the amendments he will offer.

I am grateful for the position the Senator from Arkansas has taken with respect to this proposed legislation.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my colleague.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. I desire to join with others of my colleagues in paying tribute to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] who is a truly great and courageous American. In the conducting of his hearings during the past several years he has rendered an inestimable public service, and has made an invaluable contribution to his country. I hope the Senator's recommendations in the labor-management field will receive the thoughtful consideration and support of the Senate.

I regret I was unable to be present to hear all of the Senator's forthright and outstanding speech. At this time I want to compliment him for making available the enormous amount of evidence that has been acquired through the efforts of his committee, which he has so ably and conscientiously chairmaned. This information, judiciously used, can result in the enactment of legislation that will be equitable to labor, management, and the general public. To that end, the efforts of the senior Senator from Arkansas have been devoted, and I compliment him.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I know the modest approach the Senator from Arkansas has, and I am aware that these words of praise must embarrass him; yet I cannot, personally, let this opportunity pass without paying my respect to him for two things: first, for the great work he has performed as chairman of the select committee; and, second, for the magnificent address he has delivered today upon the floor of the Senate. It has been my privilege to sit in the Chamber and hear every word of his address, and I have never been more moved since I have been a Member of this body than I was while listening to him. I was particularly impressed by his statement, so well expressed, that those of us who are concerned about this matter are not interested in punitive measures against good labor organizations or good labor leaders, but rather are concerned that unless we provide curbs and, unless we write meaningful legislation, not only will the rights of the workingmen be adversely affected, or perhaps even destroyed, in the next few years, but also perhaps the whole economy and all of America will be adversely affected.

I think the Senator from Arkansas has rendered one of the greatest services to the Senate that any man can ever expect to render in a lifetime.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my friend. I know that his remarks are far more complimentary than I deserve. I have simply, with my colleagues, labored in the vineyard of duty as I saw it. I am hopeful our labors will not have been in vain.

Mr. President, some reference has been made to politics. I did not relish this job when I took it. I realized there was a job which needed to be done. But I assure Senators that when I accepted the appointment and when I became the chairman of the select committee I was under no illusions whatsoever about the political implications or the dangers which were inherent in trying to perform the service. I put my head on the political block then. I am not going to remove it now. If my conscience tells me that we need to do this thing this way, that way, or some other way, with all deference and after giving due consideration to the counsel of my colleagues and others who are interested and who perhaps know more about the matter than I do, I am going to offer the amendments and do what I think is right and necessary in the interest of the people of the country and particularly of the workers.

I start today, Mr. President, by offering my first amendment. I call up my amendment "4–20–59–M." The amendment has some minor modifications, and I am not sure the copy at the desk has the modifications, so I send to the desk the amendment as modified.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be reported by title, because I am sure Senators are familiar with it. It is printed and on the desk, and I intend to read most of the amendment myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 5, between lines 6 and 7, to insert title I—Bill of Rights of Members of Labor Organizations.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

There being no objection, Mr. McCLELLAN's amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 5, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

"TITLE I—BILL OF RIGHTS OF MEMBERS OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

"SEC. 101. (a)(1) EQUAL RIGHTS.—Every member of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization, including identical voting rights and equal protection of its rules and regulations.

"(2) FREEDOM OF SPEECH.—Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to express any views, arguments, or opinions regarding any matter respecting such organization or its officers, agents, or representatives, and to disseminate such views, arguments, or opinions either orally or in printed, graphic, or visual form without being subject to penalty, discipline, or interference of any kind by such organization.

"(3) FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY.—Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with any other members for the purpose of exchanging views and reaching decisions with respect to any matters pertaining to such organization or its officers, agents, or representatives, without being subject to penalty, discipline, or interference of any kind by such organization.

"(4) FREEDOM FROM ARBITRARY FINANCIAL EXACTIONS.—(A) The rates of dues and initiation fees payable by members of any such labor organization in effect on the effective date of this subsection shall not be changed, and no new or additional dues or initiation fees shall be imposed and no special or general assessment shall be levied upon such members, except upon (i) majority vote by secret ballot of the members present at a general membership meeting held after not less than fifteen days' written notice to each member at his last known address, or by majority vote of the membership by referendum conducted upon such notice by secret ballot through the mails, in the case of a local labor organization, (ii) majority vote of the delegates present at a general meeting of duly chosen delegates held after not less than thirty days' written notice to the principal office of each local or constituent labor organization entitled to such notice, in the case of a national or international labor organization.

"(B) The initiation fee, in the case of any individual seeking to become a member of such organization, shall not be in excess of 75 per centum of the amount of the prevailing weekly wage payable to individuals in the same category of employment as such person, as of the time such fee is imposed, in the vicinity of such bargaining unit.

"(5) PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO SUE.—No such labor organization shall limit the right of any member or officer thereof to institute an action in any court, or in a proceeding before any administrative agency, irrespective of whether or not the labor organization or its officers are named as defendants or respondents in such action or proceeding, or the right of any member or officer of such labor organization to appear as a witness in any judicial, administrative, or legislative proceeding, or to petition any legislature or to communicate with any legislator: Provided, That any such member or officer may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures within such organization, not requiring longer than three months to final decision, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organization or any officer thereof.

"(6) SAFEGUARDS AGAINST IMPROPER DISCIPLINARY ACTION.—No member of any such labor organization may be fined, suspended, expelled, or otherwise disciplined by such organization or any officer thereof except for breach of a published written rule of such organization which is not inconsistent with any of the provisions of this title. Disciplinary action may not be taken unless such member has been (A) served with a written copy of the provisions of the constitution and bylaws or other governing charter of such organization which contains a listing of the rights and safeguards afforded him pursuant to this title with respect to the conditions under which disciplinary action may be taken; (B) served with written specific charges; (C) given a reasonable time to prepare his defense; (D) afford a full and fair hearing; and (E) afforded final review on a written transcript of the hearing, by an impartial person or persons (i) agreed to by such organization and the accused, or (ii) designated by an independent arbitration or mediation association or board.

"(7) INSPECTION OF MEMBERSHIP LISTS.—Any candidate for office in any such labor organization or his agent shall have the right to inspect and reproduce, for purposes relating to his candidacy, a list of the names and last known addresses of all members of such organization. Such list shall be maintained at the principal place of business of such organization by a designated official thereof.

"(b) Any provision of the constitution and bylaws or other governing charter of any labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce which is inconsistent with the provisions of this section shall be of no force or effect.

"SEC. 102. Any officer or agent of any such labor organization who, through use or abuse of authority, or through failure to discharge the duties of his office, or otherwise, willfully interferes with or prevents, or attempts to interfere with or prevent, the exercise by any member of a right to which such member is entitled under the provisions of section 101 shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 103. The Secretary, whenever it shall appear that any person has violated or is about to violate any of the provisions of this title, may bring an action in a district court or other court of the United States for such relief as may be appropriate including, but without limitation, injunctions to restrain any such violations and to compel compliance with this title. Any such action against a labor organization may be brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia or in the district court or other court of the United States where the violation occurred or is about to occur.

"SEC. 104. The provisions of this title shall become applicable—

"(1) ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act in the case of a labor organization whose constitution and bylaws can lawfully be modified or amended by action of its constitutional officers, governing body, or membership; or

"(2) where such modification can only be made by a constitutional convention of the labor organization, (A) ten days after the holding of the next such convention held after the date of enactment of this Act, or (B) two years, in the case of a national or international labor organization, or (C) one year, in the case of a local labor organization, after the date of enactment of this Act, whichever is sooner."

Redesignate titles I to VI as II to VII, respectively, and renumber sections and references thereto accordingly.

On page 49, before the period in line 19 insert a comma and the following: "or because of exclusion or expulsion from a labor organization in any manner or for any reason inconsistent with the requirements of this Act."

On page 51, between lines 11 and 12, insert the following:

"(k) 'Member' or 'Member in good standing' when used in reference to a labor organization, includes any person who has fulfilled or tendered the lawful requirements for membership in such organization, and who neither has voluntarily withdrawn from membership nor has been expelled or suspended from membership after appropriate proceedings consistent with lawful provisions of the constitution, bylaws, or other governing charter of such organization."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask for the yeas and nays on his amendment?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the McClellan amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief observation?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. It has never been my privilege to serve with the distinguished Senator from Arkansas on either of the committees mentioned, but I want to congratulate the Senator for the high integrity and the great courage he has displayed throughout the hearings and on the floor today. I assure the Senator from Arkansas I believe, as he does, that what he proposes is necessary for the good of the country, and I intend to back him to the fullest.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my friend. I am very happy to have his support, and I appreciate his complimentary references to the work I have tried to do.

Mr. President, I testified before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare generally, though not with respect to any particular bill, when the subject of this proposal was before the committee. I testified without any prepared remarks, because I did not have time to prepare them. At that time I made the statement, "I believe that if you would give to the individual members of the unions the tools with which to do it, they would pretty well clean house themselves."

If we want fewer laws—and want to need fewer laws—providing regulation in this field, we should start with the basic things. We should give union members their inherent constitutional rights, and we should make those rights apply to union membership as well as to other affairs of life. We should protect the union members in those rights. By so doing we will be giving them the tools they can use themselves. That is all I propose to do by this amendment.

I am no authority on labor legislation. I am sure, as has been observed in this instance, that it is hardly possible to offer an amendment which may not need some perfection. Upon that score, if any perfecting is needed, I shall be happy to accept it. What I wish to emphasize as I present this amendment are the basic principles which are involved. I ask my colleagues to join me in enacting legislation which will accomplish what the amendment provides.

The first part of the amendment reads:

TITLE I—BILL OF RIGHTS OF MEMBERS OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 101. (a)(1) EQUAL RIGHTS.—Every member of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization, including identical voting rights and equal protection of its rules and regulations.

The select committee found time and again the denial of the right to vote, the denial of the right to work, the denial of the right to have a voice, the denial of the basic human rights on which our very freedom was founded.

The next paragraph is headed "Freedom of Speech." It reads as follows:

(2) FREEDOM OF SPEECH.—Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to express any views, arguments, or opinions regarding any matter respecting such organization or its officers, agents, or representatives, and to disseminate such views, arguments, or opinions either orally or in printed, graphic, or visual form, without being subject to penalty, discipline, or interference of any kind by such organization.

Before I conclude my remarks upon this amendment I shall read some of the things for which union members can be punished arbitrarily without a trial. Those are some of the evils we are seeking to correct.

One may ask, "Are union members ever interfered with?" Yes, they are. Union officers send to other places and bring in thugs and hoodlums. If a union member undertakes to speak, or to try to obtain the floor, they move over toward him and say, "Be quiet, Bud. You are out of order." And he had better be quiet, too. They mean business.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield on that point?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CURTIS. What the Senator says is very true. It was proved over and over again in the hearings of the select committee.

It might also be pointed out that union members called as witnesses before our committee and placed under oath have, on several occasions, given evidence of being actually afraid of the consequences ensuing upon what they said under oath before a public body such as our committee. Is not that true?

Mr. McCLELLAN. They are afraid of reprisals against them. Two waitresses from Chicago testified that it required 6 months to get a job. Union officials go around and interfere. They say to a prospective employer, "If you hire this person, you will have labor trouble." They cannot come here and tell the truth without risking reprisals.

This provision is for the benefit of the working people, the people from whom some of these parasites draw the lifeblood which courses through their veins.

Mr. CURTIS. I think it is also safe to say that there have been witnesses who have taken the fifth amendment and have stated that they declined to testify on the ground that it might tend to incriminate them, when they did so for the protection of a higher union boss. Such witnesses have been branded in the public press, and by their fellows, as takers of the fifth amendment, when they have been unwilling takers of the fifth amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is true. That applies not only to union officials, but it applies in business. Sometimes a conspiracy becomes so involved and so corrupt that those concerned with it take the fifth amendment.

Senators would be surprised by some of the cases. They would not believe that such things could occur. However, the evidence shows what the abuse of power is doing in America. Such power must be curbed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. First, I believe every American appreciates the extraordinary service which the distinguished Senator from Arkansas has rendered in connection with the so-called Senate labor rackets committee. I believe every Member of the Senate must take very seriously, indeed, the advice he gives us on the entire subject.

I am in accord with the principle that a bill of rights for members of a labor organization would be a good thing. I have not yet made up my mind how I shall vote on the pending amendment. I am concerned that the draftsmanship of this amendment may unwittingly lend itself to just the opposite of what is intended.

There are restrictions which cause me to be a little worried as to whether the amendment will really have the effect we want it to have. In particular, I invite the Senators' attention to subsection 6 of section 101, which appears on page 4 of the proposed amendment, under the title "Safeguards Against Improper Disciplinary Action."

It occurred to me, as I read that provision, that we are, perhaps, building up a procedure and a bureaucracy all out of proportion to what we are trying to do.

For example, assume that a certain union member gets drunk and makes a public nuisance of himself in such a way as to bring the union into disrepute. Perhaps union officers would fine him $10. Under the provisions of the proposed amendment, he must be served with a written copy of the provisions of the constitution and bylaws or other governing charter of such organization. He must be served with a copy of written specific charges, given a reasonable time to prepare his defense, awarded a full and fair hearing, and afforded final review on a written transcript of the hearing by an impartial person or persons.

All this sounds as though he were to be indicted for a serious crime. I wonder if it would not be adequate protection if we required that the individual be served with the charges, given a reasonable time to prepare his defense, and afforded a full and fair hearing.

This is an example of what concerns me in connection with carrying out in practice the safeguards which I agree with the Senator are needed. There ought to be a bill of rights for union labor.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If a man is fined under the civil law for being drunk, he can require a bill of charges against him, and he can have a jury of his peers pass upon his guilt or innocence. There is a great deal more involved than a $10 fine, if union officials can expel a member from the lodge and keep him from working.

They can do that and have done it in many cases. I do not say that being drunk would be called improper conduct or a reflection upon the union. However, many of the charges, in my judgment, have been trumped up charges. Those accused are helpless. They would have to go before whom? They would have to go before the executive board or the executive committee. That board or committee would be appointed by whom? It would be appointed by the ones who make the charges.

What we are trying to do is to protect a man from being arbitrarily disciplined without a fair hearing and without the right to protect his livelihood. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for his explanation. I shall certainly listen with interest to the comments of the sponsor of the amendment. It may be that the Senator is correct, that we must be as elaborate as he suggests in order to provide effective relief.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say that it is not half so elaborate as the provision in the amendment which the Senate adopted yesterday dealing with the no-man's land situation. That is an involved subject if I ever heard of one.

Mr. CLARK. The no-man's land situation is a very difficult one to deal with.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I merely wish to say that with the no-man's land provision it was my intention to protect States rights.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will help the Senator do that. I believe my proposed amendment will do what should be done without any quibbling, and I hope the Senator from Oregon will support it.

I do not wish to take too much time, and I do not wish to refuse to yield to any Senator who desires to ask me questions, but if I can pursue this subject for a few minutes, I will be able to conclude very shortly. I have discussed freedom of speech.

Next is freedom of assembly:

(3) FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY.—Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with any other members for the purpose of exchanging views and reaching decisions with respect to any matters pertaining to such organization or its officers, agents, or representatives, without being subject to penalty, discipline, or interference of any kind by such organization.

That gives union members the right to assemble in groups, if they like, and to visit their neighbors and to discuss union affairs, and to say what they think, or perhaps discuss what should be done to straighten out union affairs, or perhaps discuss the promotion of a union movement, or perhaps a policy in which they believe. They would be able to do all of that without being punished for doing it, as is actually happening today.

The next is freedom from arbitrary financial exactions:

(4) FREEDOM FROM ARBITRARY FINANCIAL EXACTIONS.—(A) The rates of dues and initiation fees payable by members of any such labor organization in effect on the effective date of this subsection shall not be changed, and no new or additional dues or initiation fees shall be imposed and no special or general assessment shall be levied upon such members, except upon (i) majority vote by secret ballot of the members present at a general membership meeting held after not less than fifteen days' written notice to each member at his last known address, or by majority vote of the membership by referendum conducted upon such notice by secret ballot through the mails, in the case of a local labor organization, (ii) majority vote of the delegates present at a general meeting of duly chosen delegates held after not less than thirty days' written notice to the principal office of each local or constituent labor organization entitled to such notice, in the case of a national or international labor organization.

In other words, the dues or the initiation fees cannot be increased, as they have been in certain instances. For example, if certain jobs come along, the initiation fees are hiked up. Some of the new members get the new jobs, and the old members who have been members for a long time, get no assignment to work. That has happened in my State, and it is happening in other States, too. It is not right; it is wrong.

The next item I cover is the protection of the right to sue:

(5) PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO SUE.—No such labor organization shall limit the right of any member or officer thereof to institute an action in any court, or in a proceeding before any administrative agency, irrespective of whether or not the labor organization or its officers are named as defendants or respondents in such action or proceeding, or the right of any member or officer of such labor organization to appear as a witness in any judicial, administrative, or legislative proceeding, or to petition any legislature or to communicate with any legislator: Provided, That any such member or officer may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures within such organization, not requiring longer than 3 months to final decision, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organization or any officer thereof.

The section I discussed previously with the Senator from Pennsylvania safeguards union members against improper disciplinary action. We prescribe a procedure under which a union member who pays his dues, before he can be expelled or punished, is protected. I wish Senators to listen to what a member of some unions can be expelled for or punished for. How would Senators like to be tried under such a general policy as I am about to read, without any specifications, before a board or a committee appointed by the officers who make the accusation? The material I am about to read has been prepared by the Commerce Clearing House, Labor Research Staff, and it states that good standing in a union can be lost for a variety of reasons. I am not now speaking about my own findings. I am not talking about what the select committee has found. All this can be substantiated by the information we have in our possession. The report states:

Good standing in a union can be lost for a variety of reasons so broad or vague and uncertain as to be subject to abuse and discriminatory application.

The report goes on to show that under some union constitutions a union has the power to suspend or expel a member on such grounds as "engaging in conduct unbecoming a union member."

What does that mean? It is not necessary to spell out the accusation. Those in control of the union can say, "We mean you got drunk," or they can say, "You did thus and so," or "failing to give full cooperation to a union committee."

What does that mean? I do not always give full cooperation to some of the committees on which I serve. I sometimes express a little opposition. Why should not union members have the right to object now and then. Why must they keep silent? Must they keep silent or be expelled? Or "criticizing union officials."

The officials can say to a member, "You had better not criticize a union official. You dare not criticize him. If you do, you can be expelled." No wonder they get by stealing so much from their fellow members. Or "questioning the motives or questioning the integrity of an officer or a member of a committee."

In other words, a union member dare not question the integrity of an officer. In some unions, if a member does that, he can be expelled.

I say we must give the members of the union the tools with which the unions can be given back to them.

That is not all, Mr. President. Another ground for disciplining or expelling a member is "circulating matter calculated to harm or defame or injure a fellow member."

Another one is "applying for the position of another union man in office."

A member had better not do that. The officers have squatters' rights. Members had better not offer any competition. They had better not seek election. They had better not aspire to the presidency or the secretaryship, or they will be expelled or disciplined.

Another is "using profane language."

I wonder how many would remain in office if they could be expelled for using profane language. "Engaging in personal arguments."

Members cannot even engage in personal arguments without being subjected to the danger of expulsion.

These are not my findings, but the findings of the Commerce Clearing House in its labor research report of 1959.

This is how the union members would be protected. I read from my amendment and I ask Senators to listen to what I read:

SEC. 102. Any officer or agent or any such labor organization who—through use or abuse of authority, or through failure to discharge the duties of his office, or otherwise, willfully interferes with or prevents, or attempts to interfere with or prevent, the exercise by any member of a right to which such member is entitled under the provisions of section 101 shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

The next section provides that the Secretary of Labor, when he thinks a violation of these rights is being committed by the union, or is about to be committed, should have the right to go to court to seek to enjoin the union from committing such wrongs.

I call attention to the penalty section, section 506. What I propose to do implements this section. The section reads:

It shall be unlawful for any labor organization, its officers, agents, representatives, or employees to fine, suspend, expel, or otherwise discipline any of its members for exercising any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act.

All I want to have is to have the rights defined, so that there will be no mistake about what is meant. It is understood that the worker has certain rights. We recognize that they can be abused. Let us define those rights; let us say what they are, just as the rights of the American people are set forth in the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the United States. Then we will know exactly what the rights are.

Listen to the next subsection:

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person through the use of force or violence, or threat of the use of force or violence, or by economic reprisal or threat thereof, to restrain, coerce, or intimidate, or attempt to restrain, coerce, or intimidate any member of a labor organization for the purpose of interfering with or preventing the exercising by such member of any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act.

Again, let us define what is meant. The penalty is set forth, but the definition of the rights is vague and uncertain. The rights which I desire to have spelled out in the bill are not now defined in the bill. Such rights are basic. They ought to be basic to every person, and they are, under the Constitution of the United States.

The next provision reads:

(c) Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 2 years, or both.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. First, I commend the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, the hard-working, well-informed chairman of our investigating subcommittee, for offering this amendment, which he refers to as a bill of rights for members of labor organizations. It seems to me this is a direction in which Congress might very well move. We are interested in preserving the functions of labor unions from the standpoint of their capacity to serve the working men and women of the Nation, rather than to devise legislation which will protect labor leaders in certain vested interests which they have.

I call especial attention to the section on page 3: "Protection of the right to sue." That is a great American right which citizens outside of unions always have. I am certain the chairman of our committee will recall the testimony of Roy Underwood, who appeared as a witness before our committee. Roy Underwood was the president of Local 542 of the Operating Engineers, a union, incidentally, which was under the stewardship of Joe E. Fay until 1948. That particular local, under the direction of Roy Underwood, initiated an action against William Maloney. Mr. Maloney at that time had intervened against the local in the effort which the local was making to negotiate a better wage contract for its employees.

For this action on the part of William Maloney, as an international officer, in trying to circumvent freedom of speech on the part of the local, Mr. Underwood initiated an action at law. What happened? Because of Mr. Underwood's action, he was charged by the union and later expelled from it by the executive board of the international. Underwood, according to the testimony, had been fighting the corrupt elements in the Operating Engineers Union for 2 years. Two weeks ago, in a period of frustration, this unfortunate man committed suicide.

It seems to me that we are certainly on the right track when we guarantee to the new Roy Underwoods, the present-day leaders of labor, who want to have honesty in their union, the right to sue and to bring into court the persons who are divesting them and their unions of their funds and their right to American citizenship.

I think this is a most important contribution to the rights of union members in America.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, who serves so ably on the committee with the rest of us who have been trying to meet our responsibilities and to fulfill the assignment given us by this great body.

Mr. President, I conclude by saying again that I think we ought to start with the union man, with the worker, and to relieve him from the oppression which has been thrust upon him in some places. We should restore to him his rights. We should vest in him again the power to do something to protect his rights. We must give him the authority again to run his own union. We must pass a law, such as the measure now proposed, which will enable him to prevent usurpation by would-be exploiters. Let us start to help the worker.

I offer this amendment with the support, I hope, of Senators on both sides of the aisle. I may not succeed. The amendment may be defeated. If the amendment shall be defeated, and if I go down in this fight, the workers of America who are being exploited today will go down with me. But they will not go down with my vote.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] for the great work he has done in this field. I call particular attention to the provisions which make membership lists available to the members of a local who are in good standing. I was successful in the committee in having an amendment adopted which provided for that. Later on it was reconsidered and was modified.

My amendment provided that any member in good standing who was a candidate for office should have access to the membership list at least 30 days prior to the election. That amendment was adopted. Later it was reconsidered, and the bill now contains language that virtually makes the incumbent union officers the campaign managers of any opponent within the union. How ridiculous can we get in that respect?

The language at the bottom of page 35 of the bill reads:

Such labor organization and its officers shall not discriminate in favor of or against any candidate with respect to the use of lists of members and shall comply with all reasonable requests of any candidate to distribute by mail or otherwise—

That is, distribute the literature of an opponent—at the candidate's expense campaign literature in aid of such person's candidacy to all members in good standing of such labor organization.

Then the bill provides:

Such moneys of a labor organization may be utilized for notices, factual statements of issues—

I wish to stress the words "factual statements of issues." In other words, an incumbent officer can send out any material he wishes to, at union expense, under the guise that it is a "factual statement of issues."

Furthermore, the bill does not contain any requirement that a union shall notify its members about when an election will be held. The bill requires that 15 days' notice of an election shall be given—unless the election is held at the regular time specified in the constitution and bylaws of such organization on file with the Secretary of Labor.

But, Mr. President, when such elections are held at intervals of anywhere from 1 year to 3 years, is it likely that a union member will remember the date and the time for the holding of the election, unless he receives a notice in advance of the election?

The argument against giving such a notice is that it might fall into the hands of unscrupulous employers or into the hands of rival labor unions. If such a notice can be used by them to the disadvantage of the union members, then what is the purpose of the bill, anyway? The purpose of the bill is to protect the rights of the average union member.

I commend the Senator from Arkansas very highly for his bill of rights statement. I think it is a splendid document. I have not had a chance to analyze it thoroughly, but I certainly agree that much of what is included in the amendment is worthy of the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the able Senator from Vermont. I take it that he agrees with me in principle, in purpose, and in objective.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANDOLPH in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I was much impressed with the Senator's testimony before our committee; and I, myself, explored the idea of a bill of rights. In fact, I proposed one during the committee's consideration of the bill.

The one I proposed was essentially declaratory of existing law, and proposed a statement, in simple terms, of the rights of union members and of their rights under the Kennedy-Ervin bill; but both concepts were declaratory of existing law.

By way of to some extent meeting that suggestion, there was included in the pending bill section 508, with which I am sure my colleague, the Senator from Arkansas, is familiar. It appears on page 54, in lines 3 to 7, and reads as follows:

SEC. 508. Every labor organization required to comply with the provisions of this act shall inform all of its members concerning the provisions of the act and the rights guaranteed members thereunder in a manner prescribed by the Secretary.

That was essentially the disposition, on a compromise, of my proposed bill of rights, which I shall be more than happy to make available to the Senate.

What puzzles me about this matter—and let me say that, like the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], I approach it with an open mind and with a feeling for it, because I think there is a very desirable field for such a bill of rights—is whether such a bill of rights shall contain substantive law, which the Senator from Arkansas has included in his amendment; and, second, shall we do so without having a body of hearings expressly directed to such substantive law?

I wish to make my question very precise, because I may say that I, together with all my colleagues, I believe, have a very enormous respect for the work the Senator from Arkansas has done and for the beating he has taken and for the great service he has rendered to all of us by his efforts.

For example, he has included a provision which limits the amount of initiation fees. All of us know the excesses which have been practiced in connection with initiation fees.

The Senator from Arkansas has also included a provision, for example, in regard to a set way of providing due process in the event of disciplinary action; and he has also included a provision in regard to membership lists, to which my colleague has just referred, and which has been a very hotly debated question.

For example, I call attention to the provision at the top of page 4 of his amendment; I refer to the provision in regard to the right to sue. That provision imposes a limit of 3 months on proceedings within a union before there is a final decision, as the statutory waiting period which is considered reasonable.

I ask my colleague, in a true spirit of inquiry, whether he believes we have enough factual backing for these specific legislative proposals in his amendment, in order to justify them; or whether we might be better off if we were to consider a bill of rights in terms of the declarations of existing law, as well as in terms of the declarations of whatever provisions we include in the pending bill?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I may say to my friend that a bill of rights in some form was before the Senate when it extensively debated the other labor bill last year. I said that the labor union members should be given just laws, and then they will do the necessary job themselves. I did not ask the committee for this. But the committee has pursued it. I hoped the committee would pursue it further.

I do not care to argue about whether the period of time should be 3 months, 4 months, or 6 months; but certainly some date must be set. I want the date that is set to be a reasonable and proper one; but I do not want the period which is prescribed to be so arbitrarily long that it will deny union members what they are entitled to, and will cause them to wait an unjust length of time, and thus will amount to obstruction, rather than the provision of a proper opportunity for them to exercise their rights.

I care not whether the period provided for is 3 months, 4 months, or 6 months. Let the Senate provide whatever is needed.

But merely because all Senators do not agree as to whether the period shall be 3 months, 4 months, or 6 months, or simply because Senators say they are not sure, is no justification for saying that the Senate should do nothing about the matter. If the Senate were to take that attitude, no legislation in this field would ever be enacted, for certainly we can always argue about any legislative proposals.

But in this case the danger is very much greater than most Senators realize. A movement is under way. The Hoffa element, the criminals, the syndicated crime crowd, are taking over, and are making a vehicle out of the labor union movement; and Hoffa is glad to have them do so, for he knows how to operate with them. It takes something like that, it seems, in many instances, in order for such a person to be eligible to obtain an appointment from him to a high position.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield further to me?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I know—because we have been through the bill quite exhaustively—that the pending bill itself contains a good many provisions in regard to internal union democracy, criminals holding office, and so forth. I believe it would be only fair to the sponsor of the bill to let him dig into that field.

My purpose in holding this colloquy with the Senator is to have the Senate deal with the question of principles.

I think I have the Senator's answer—namely, that if substantive law is included in the bill, each of us must pass on it in accordance with his own conscience, but that the committee had every opportunity, if it chose to do so, at the hearings, to go into the angles of substantive law.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Indeed so; and obviously we give the union members some rights in the bill, because we insert in the bill a criminal penalty in the case of those who violate the rights given the union members. I simply propose that we define and describe those rights, which are basic, and which every citizen of the country is entitled to. I believe we should elucidate on this point.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

HOFFA'S COMBINE: HE QUIETLY, INFORMALLY BUILDS POTENT ALLIANCE OF TRANSPORT UNIONS—TEAMSTER AND MARITIME UNITS ARE CORE—FLIGHT ENGINEERS FRIENDLY, RAIL UNIONS SHY—WHAT WILL AFL–CIO DO?

(By Roscoe Born)

WASHINGTON.—The grand alliance of transportation unions that Teamster President James R. Hoffa proclaimed last year, then appeared to abandon after outcries of alarm, has quietly become an all-but-accomplished fact.

Largely unnoticed, Mr. Hoffa and key collaborators have put together basic pieces of the combine—enough of them to indicate that an unprecedented Teamster-led monopoly is taking shape. The transport combine will have greater power to bargain, to organize, and to strike than do its unions operating on their own. Whether or not this power is ever called into full play—as, say, in a national transportation strike—the mere fact of its existence will make the combine formidable for employers and for the public at large.

Here's the status of the assembly operation so far:

Mr. Hoffa's own truckdrivers are now firmly linked with longshoremen and seamen's unions on both coasts. These allies include Joe Curran's AFL–CIO National Maritime Union, with 40,000 members sailing out of Atlantic and Pacific coast ports, as well as the Great Lakes; Harry Bridges' independent International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, numbering 70,000 dockworkers and warehousemen on the Pacific Coast and in Hawaii; and Capt. William Bradley's independent International Longshoremen's Association, with 52,000 dockhands on the Atlantic coast.

ANOTHER UNION BOXED IN

Another dock union, holding sway on the increasingly important Great Lakes, is boxed into the point where it may have to join the Hoffa league or be squeezed out of business.

Mr. Hoffa has built a strong tie with one air transport union, the 5,000-man Flight Engineers, and is flirting with the airline stewardesses' union; he also has tasted success in a drive to enlist in the Teamsters the men who work in and around the Nation's biggest airports.

And within 2 years, one top truck union strategist predicts, the growing power of this combine will attract at least some of the standoffish railroad brotherhoods—despite the rail unions' steadfast denials. "They know there's not a ghost of a chance that we'd go along with them," insists one railroad union official.

What has developed so far may not be a complete conference on transportation unity on the 50-union scale envisioned last year, but it's close enough to convince Mr. Hoffa that success can't elude him.

"We already have the nucleus set up with the Teamsters and the maritime unions," he declares. "Eventually, the others—including rail and air—will see the advantages of this cooperation and they'll want in, too. It may never be formally proclaimed the way conference on transportation unity was announced last year, but it will exist and will be just as effective as what we had planned for the conference on transportation unity." Although Mr. Hoffa had first mentioned the idea of an alliance of transportation unions some months earlier—in mid-1957—congressional and AFL–CIO reaction to last July's formal conference on transportation unity announcement was so violent that he backed off.

HOFFA SCOFFS AT NATIONAL TIEUP

Even now, without the railroad unions, the combined power of the unions already allied is enough to halt the flow of much of the Nation's commerce if they all decided to strike simultaneously. If the combine reaches full flower, this paralytic power would become complete. Mr. Hoffa naturally scoffs at any such possibility: "Talk of a national transportation tieup is nonsense," he snaps. The Teamster chief argues such a step would be self-destructive, figuring Congress would ram through legislation to stop the strike.

As a practical matter, anyway, Mr. Hoffa and his allies expect to achieve their ends without having to resort to such extremes. Local or regional tieups would be more likely. The combine might, say, close down the port of New York or cut off supplies to the island of Puerto Rico to back up demands of one union. Or it might merely move against a single employer group at a time in any one area. "The only way to win a strike," contends the Teamster chief, "is to shut one group down and let potential competitors operate."

As of now, the transport unions' capacity for united strike action is limited; because contracts expire on varying dates, the unions can't all walk out at once without risking costly lawsuits. But most of them can and will refuse under contract provisions, to cross other transport unions' picket lines. And the wealthy Teamsters can extend financial help to less prosperous striking unions. Furthermore, the transport unions are working toward common contract expiration dates, which would make simultaneous strike action possible.

Such strategy aims basically, of course, to strengthen union hands at the bargaining table. The Teamsters already are mapping joint bargaining strategy with friendly dock unions; each knows in advance what the other will demand from employers that two or more of them deal with. While the transport combine may never adopt a complete uniform slate of contract goals, Mr. Hoffa can at least be expected to work out common demands for fringe benefits such as pensions, and to stand firm against contract proposals he considers too gentle. And the allies will work to minimize the impact of automation on transport unions notably in warehouses and on the waterfront.

"Full coordination of bargaining demands is a good, sound policy and essential to the well-being of all our members," says Teddy Gleason, general organizer of the International Longshoremen's Association, after a visit to Harry Bridges' west coast dock union.

More effective organizing is another target of the combine. "We'll work to eliminate jurisdictional problems," asserts Mr. Hoffa. As a clue to what may be in store, it's noteworthy that the Teamsters already are collaborating with the ILA and the National Maritime Union to sign up workers along the Canadian side of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

These varied goals may lead the transport unions to a more formal organization than now is envisioned. A Teamster official says the combine will be interested in legislation, as well as bargaining and organizing. "If we're going into these matters," he adds, "that means we'll have to set up a research department. And if we're going to have that, we'll have to have a per capita tax from each union."

Mr. Hoffa's recent gains have been achieved in relative silence, thus avoiding the uproar that greeted his proclamation of a permanent conference on transportation unity last July. So violent was the reaction then—both in Congress and in the AFL–CIO—that Mr. Hoffa never held a heralded meeting of an estimated 50 union presidents to perfect his conference on transportation unity.

QUIETLY RESUMED WORKING

Then, while the epidemic of Hoffaphobia died down, the persistent little Teamster leader started working more quietly toward the same goal. Just the other day, when he met in New York with 13 other union chiefs, notably bosses of dock and seamen's unions, there were earnest denials that transportation unity was afoot. But as Mr. Hoffa left the meeting, one of his top aides whispered, "There's your conference on transportation unity," and Jimmy grinned in agreement.

The current steps toward a transport combine, however quietly and informally taken, seem likely sooner or later to kick up a storm on Capitol Hill, just as last summer's announcement of the original plan did—especially since the plan then and now includes Mr. Bridges, leftwing leader of the west coast longshoremen.

At that time Senator EASTLAND, Mississippi Democrat, who heads the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, called such an alliance a "threat to national security." Arkansas' Democratic Senator McCLELLAN, chairman of the Special Senate Investigating Committee, declared "the welding of Hoffa's powers with those inherent in these other organizations has grave implications for the destiny of our national economy." Chimed in GOP Representative HOFFMAN from Mr. Hoffa's home State of Michigan: "If such a federation calls a strike they could starve us into submission in 6 days."

Also incensed was the AFL–CIO. Only months earlier it had expelled the Teamsters on grounds of corruption. The old AFL had kicked out the International Longshoremen's Association in 1953 as a gangster-dominated union and the old CIO booted Harry Bridges' union in 1950 as Communist-dominated.

MEANY'S ORDER

The presence of the Teamsters and the ILA in the group's list of sponsors "could very well be the start of what you might call a birds-of-a-feather federation," Mr. Meany declared. What was worse, to federation officials, was the fact that AFL–CIO unions—including that of Joe Curran, National Maritime Union president and a vice president of the AFL–CIO—were joining up. Mr. Meany and his colleagues promptly ordered all federation affiliates to cancel formal pacts with expelled unions.

Then something happened to brighten Mr. Hoffa's hopes. Last December, Mr. Curran of the NMU, and Mr. Hall, president of the rival Seafarers' International Union, forgot a lengthy feud in order to promote a 4-day worldwide boycott by many transport unions of ships flying flags of convenience. These are U.S.-owned vessels sailing under flags of Panama, Liberia, Honduras, and Costa Rica to avoid high labor costs and taxes in the United States. Labor officials say the boycott tied up 160 vessels in 19 ports, but really effective only in the United States where Mr. Hoffa's Teamsters cooperated.

More cooperation grew out of this 4-day effort. The following month, Mr. Hall and Mr. Curran signed a formal peace treaty ending their feud. Both agreed to drop lawsuits, charges of unfair labor practices, and other disputes. It was Mr. Hoffa who, his aides claim, helped bring the rivals together.

Other Hoffa efforts began to bear fruit. On the west coast, the Teamsters and Mr. Bridges' International Longshoremen and Warehousemens' Union, also foes for many years, joined hands. They set up a permanent committee of five members from each union to bring jurisdictional peace and cooperate on common problems.

Mr. Hoffa's chief of staff, Harold J. Gibbons, meanwhile went to London for conferences with officials of the International Transport Workers Federation, an organization maintained by unions in 62 nations. Mr. Gibbons carried assurances that the Teamsters would cooperate again in any new boycott of convenience ships. A week later, Mr. Hall and Mr. Curran went to London, too, to work on the boycott plans. It's expected now that the unions will select two shipping companies as sample targets and apply a permanent boycott.

It was new boycott plans that drew Mr. Hoffa and other transport union chiefs to New York earlier this month. There officials of 14 unions set up a steering committee to cooperate on any problems that confront the participating unions.

"Right now, it's just the boycott," says one union official who attended the meeting. "But it's easy to see what's on their minds. They pop up with stuff about automation and jurisdiction."

Among those at the meeting was Larry Long, president of the International Brotherhood of Longshoremen, a dock union created by the AFL to compete with the expelled International Longshoremen's Association. Though the IBL and the ILA have been enemies from the start, their leaders met on friendly terms, and some maritime union officials think a pact between them is sure to come.

SEAWAY BRINGS CHALLENGE

Mr. Long's union dominates Great Lakes docks, but with the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway faces a possible challenge from the ILA. The east coast union has contracts with some employers who expect to move inland along the Seaway. They'll bring ILA contracts with them, labor sources note. With Mr. Hoffa backing Captain Bradley's ILA, the inland dock union would be hard pressed to hold ground.

"Long either goes along with the new group, or he gets shut out," a Teamster official forecasts.

While Mr. Hoffa has been working out ties with sea and dock unions, he has been solidifying his relations with the Flight Engineers. When the engineers engaged Eastern Air Lines in a long strike late last year, they found the Teamsters willing to post collateral for a $200,000 loan to keep them going. The loan has been repaid now, and the Flight Engineers feel deeply grateful.

"We're not about to break with the Teamsters," confides one Flight Engineer official. "We have no place else to go. The federation isn't too interested in us."

Still unsettled is the Flight Engineer feud with the Air Line Pilots' Association over which union gets jurisdiction over the third crewman in jet aircraft cabins. Engineers believe this fight threatens the existance of their union, and that the federation has refused to act to protect their jurisdiction. If the Flight Engineers should strike again over this issue, they believe pilots may try to keep the airliners flying without engineers.

"We might need the Teamsters again," says an Engineer source, recalling that truck union officials were prepared last December to halt deliveries of fuel and other supplies to Engineer-struck airlines.

AID PACT STILL IN EFFECT

Still in effect, despite AFL–CIO orders, is a mutual assistance pact between the Flight Engineers and the Teamsters; it rather vaguely promises aid by each union to the other in any emergency. An Engineer source says: "The idea of further association with the Teamsters certainly isn't repugnant to us." Teamster officials predict the Engineers may join the transport combine, and one Engineer privately agrees—even if the alliance includes Harry Bridges.

"We couldn't say we're willing to accept the Teamsters but not their friends," he reasons. "We have to buy the whole package."

With the Flight Engineers in the transport league, it wouldn't be necessary to get the pilots' union, Mr. Hoffa's advisors figure. But the Teamsters are definitely eyeing a dissident segment of the pilots' union, the Air Line Stewards' and Stewardesses' Association. At the recent convention of the association in Chicago, the truck union's Mr. Gibbons was a convention-long observer and "he wasn't there just because he likes pretty girls," one labor official notes.

To help entrench his strength in the air transport field, Mr. Hoffa is pushing a drive to sign up workers in and around the airports in 22 big cities. The Teamster chief says air freight is about to blossom into a real competitor of surface shipping, and therefore the Teamsters can't ignore the airlines.

In February, Mr. Hoffa won his first round in this campaign. Pan American World Airways' stock clerks voted nearly two to one in favor of the Teamsters in an election conducted by the National Mediation Board. Teamsters thus won the right to represent 861 Pan Am employees who handle freight the airline hauls.

This still leaves the rail unions outside the Hoffa sphere, and one railway labor source insists: "Among our chiefs there isn't one that would lean that way at the present time." After reflecting a bit, he adds: "Times do change, but I just can't see our people going into any transportation council."

Nonetheless, Teamsters claim economic necessity will force some railroad unions into the alliance eventually, possibly within 2 years. According to Teamster reasoning, railroads must offer lower rates to compete with other forms of transport, notably St. Lawrence Seaway shipping, and so must try harder to keep labor costs down. That pressure will make railroad workers more interested in a broader base of bargaining strength, Teamsters contend. They point to a recent request by railroads that train unions accept a 15-cent hourly pay cut in new contracts to be negotiated by November 1. The unions were expecting to win 12 percent wage increases.

It's worth noting, too, that the railroad unions' total membership has been declining in recent years. And railroads are gradually diversifying into other forms of transportation, notably trucking and pipeline operations, in which nonrail unions have long since staked out jurisdictional claims. As a possible basis for coalition, the Teamsters already negotiate with many of the same employers that railroad brotherhoods deal with; the Hoffa union represents drivers for the trucking subsidiaries of the Santa Fe, New York Central, and Pennsylvania Railroads, to name just a few.

How will George Meany and the AFL–CIO react to the developing transport combine? Some transportation unionists argue it doesn't make any difference what the federation says now. Some unions with Teamster pacts ignored last summer's AFL–CIO edict to cancel them, they say, and the federation hasn't done anything more about it. Joe Curran, whose participation in Mr. Hoffa's CTU prompted the federation order, is still consorting with Teamsters. And now he's been joined by Mr. Hall, who is president of the AFL–CIO maritime trades department, as well as president of his own seafarers' union. So far, this fraternization with banished unions hasn't brought any new blast from Mr. Meany.

On the other hand, Mr. Meany made such a point of outlawing pacts with expelled unions that he can hardly ignore these new developments, some federation officials say. The issue undoubtedly will come up at the next AFL–CIO executive council meeting in Washington May 18. At that time, too, the council may consider whether to readmit the expelled ILA. If the longshore union is welcomed back, after trafficking with Mr. Hoffa, it would be taken as a sign that the AFL–CIO no longer objects to such behavior.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wonder whether we shall be able to obtain a unanimous-consent agreement. I am informed that some exploratory conferences have been held.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto be taken in 2 hours, with 1 hour to be under the control of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] and the other hour to be under the control of the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me point out that I have been on the floor, speaking, for probably 2 hours or longer; and I have not had an opportunity to confer with other Senators who may be interested in this amendment. I should like to have such an opportunity, at least, before I agree to such a proposal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Arkansas do so. I was informed that he was agreeable to what I have proposed, and that the ranking minority member of the committee was agreeable to it, and that the Senator from Illinois was agreeable to it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I simply do not wish to have debate cut off at the moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if there are other Senators who desire to speak, of course I shall be glad to have them do so.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that if I may have a few minutes in which to consider this matter, in a little while I shall try to ascertain whether there is some arrangement on which we can agree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard to the proposed agreement.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. First of all, I wish to join my associates in paying tribute to him as chairman of the so-called McClellan committee. If it were not for the Senator from Arkansas, this proposed legislation would not now be on the floor of the Senate.

The question is whether the bill of rights which the Senator from Arkansas has suggested can best be secured by existing State law, by the provisions of the pending bill, and by Taft-Hartley law which is now in effect.

The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as I understand it, would provide for six basic rights:

First. Equal rights within an organization.

Second. Freedom of speech.

Third. Freedom of assembly.

Fourth. Freedom from arbitrary financial exactions.

Fifth. Protection of the right to sue.

Sixth. Safeguards against improper disciplinary action.

The amendment also provides that the Secretary of Labor shall have the right to institute suits in order to protect those rights.

My objection to the amendment is not that I think the union members should not be provided with these rights. My objection is that I think members of unions are provided those rights more satisfactorily by present State law, by the provisions of the bill, and by the Taft-Hartley Act.

I say that because I think the amendment raises the question of preemption. In other words, if the proposal were enacted, the present rather exhaustive remedies provided under the common law of the various States might be wiped out, and only the rights suggested by the Senator from Arkansas would then be available to union members.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I wonder if that argument, which I think ought to be considered by the Senate, might be met on the part of the Senator from Arkansas by his agreeing to accept an unquestioned amendment with respect to a denial of preemption. I think what the Senator from Massachusetts has said must be considered.

Mr. McCLELLAN and Mr. HOLLAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas. Then I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I wanted to make a statement, for the information of all Senators, that I submitted an amendment this afternoon which will take care of that situation. The amendment is at the desk now. I do not know what the number of it is, but it will be printed.

Mr. KUCHEL. But does not the leadership want this amendment disposed of tonight?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I said an amendment to the bill.

Mr. KUCHEL. Not an amendment to this amendment?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is not an amendment to this amendment. I did not know the Senator from Massachusetts had offered an amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I had not.

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator from Massachusetts had offered the argument that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas might be interpreted as preempting the field.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is what the Senator from Massachusetts said.

Mr. KUCHEL. Is the Senator from Arkansas in a position to advise the Senate whether he would meet that argument by appropriate amendatory language in his amendment?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Without conceding the validity of the argument, I had proposed to meet that question by an amendment I submitted this afternoon. If the pending amendment is adopted, that amendment will be brought up.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I may have the attention also of the Senator from Arkansas, it seems to me section 507 of the bill we are considering amply carries out the suggestion of the Senator from California and the wishes of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Massachusetts in the field of criminal law. That provision, appearing on pages 53 and 54 of the bill, reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to impair or diminish the authority of any State, as that term is used in section 501(a), to enact or enforce its own criminal laws.

It would seem to me, therefore, the problem would be restricted to that of making sure that other rights and remedies, except those in the field of criminal law should be protected by a provision such as that the Senator from Arkansas has announced it is his intention to offer. Does the Senator from Massachusetts agree with me?

Mr. KENNEDY. I think the Senator is correct, although the section which he has read, on pages 53 and 54 of the bill, refers to criminal law, and the body of law to which I referred goes beyond that.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand, but I was trying to bring to the attention of all concerned that the point which was raised by the Senator from California should be made as to fields other than criminal law, since that field seems to have been preserved from preemption by the terms of section 507, which I have just read into the RECORD.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would think that in order to prevent this amendment from preempting the field, certainly additional language would be required either in the bill or in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HOLLAND. But that language could be restricted to fields other than the field of criminal law.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. In reference to the question which the Senator from California has raised, and with which I find myself in agreement, if we are going to meet the question of preemption entirely, not merely in the criminal law, the pending amendment should be amended, and we should not leave the remedy to some other amendment which may be offered at a later date. I must say the Senator from Massachusetts has made a good point.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I have several other reasons why I think the Senate should consider the amendment carefully before it adopts it. The description of the amendment as a bill of rights makes it extremely attractive. I think we should make sure that we shall be better off after the amendment is adopted than we are today. I call attention to page 4 of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, under the heading, "Safeguards Against Improper Disciplinary Action," which, beginning on line 8, reads:

> No member of any such labor organization may be fined, suspended, expelled, or otherwise disciplined by such organization or any officer thereof except for breach of a published written rule of such organization which is not inconsistent with any of the provisions of this title.

It seems to me it would be possible for a labor union to pass, by majority vote, a provision or a rule which would provide that any member who testified in a State legislature against a law could be subject to discipline by the union, or any member who worked in a political campaign against the position which the majority of the union had taken in a vote could also be subject to discipline.

Unless there were some changes in the doctrine of preemption, the present very adequate provisions of State law which protect members would be preempted.

The fact is that freedom of speech is restricted in lines 4, 5, and 6, of page 3 of the amendment to the following:

> Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to express any views, arguments, or opinions regarding any matter respecting such organization or its officers, agents, or representatives.

It seems to me the provision of State law in regard to protecting, for example, the rights of a member of a union—to testify in the State of Pennsylvania, for example, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania—are far more satisfactory and inclusive than is any right which is guaranteed to a union member in the bill.

I shall read from the case of Spayd against Ringing Rock Lodge, in the State of Pennsylvania, which concerns the Ringing Rock Lodge No. 665 of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, who expelled a member of their lodge for testifying in the State legislature against legislation which the union favored. The court had this to say, and this is law, and the precedent which governs:

> The rights above noted cannot lawfully be infringed, even momentarily, by individuals, any more than by the State itself (United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 23 L.Ed. 588); and least of all can they be breached by corporations and unincorporated associations, which function solely by grace of the State, and the supervision and control of which are specifically vested in courts of equity by the act of June 16, 1836 (Public Law 784, sec. 13, par. 5; Pa. St. 1920, sec. 4562). We have often said that the by-laws, rules, and regulations of these artificial bodies will be enforced only when they are reasonable (Lynn v. Freemansburg Bldg., etc., Assoc., 117 Pa. 1, 11, 11A.537, and 2 Am. St. Rep. 639; Hibernia Fire Engine Co. v. Com., 93 Pa. 264, 269; Evans v. Philadelphia Club, 50 Pa. 107, 115; Com. v. Detwiller, 131 Pa. 614, 634, 18A.990, 992, 7 L.R.A. 357, 360; Arbour v. Pittsburgh Produce Trade Association, 44 Pa. Super. 240, 250); and they never can be adjudged reasonable when, as here, they would compel the citizen to lose his property rights in accumulated assets, or forgo the exercise of other rights which are constitutionally inviolable. Defendant lodge is part of a beneficial organization, and there is a finding that plaintiff has a substantial property interest therein. Under these circumstances, it will not do to say that he can freely regain full liberty of action, at any time, by disassociating himself from the order; but, even if he could, the rule, as construed by defendants, would still be discountenanced and void in law.

The point of the matter is, if the Members of the Senate will examine the laws, the States have provided broad protections for members of voluntary organizations. I consider those protections to be broader than the provisions of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARK and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield first to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and then I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

The argument of the Senator from Massachusetts is persuasive, but I wonder if the Senator can tell us what was the relief sought in the Pennsylvania case and what was the relief granted? My own fear is that the law of my State, not being everything one could wish, in some instances, tends to protect property rights substantially more fully than it tends to protect human rights.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator that in this case the expulsion of the member from the union was set aside, and those in control of the union were compelled to accept him back into the union.

Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to point out to the Senator that the McClellan committee took testimony in reference to a case in Pennsylvania, wherein a union member went to a union meeting and spoke in opposition to the crowd in control. When that member left the meeting, he was unmercifully beaten on an elevator. Some "goons" took possession of the elevator and made the man go up and down on it. He almost lost his eyesight. He was suffering from cancer when he testified, which might have been related to that incident. After being released by the doctor, he took his complaint to a magistrate in the State of Pennsylvania, and the magistrate dismissed the case, saying, "That is just a union brawl, and we do not get into them."

I for one am going to vote to give these men a right to go into the U.S. courts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say, Mr. President, that in my opinion, the argument made is really not a valid one. The Senator is not pretending to say, I hope, that it is not against the law in the State of Pennsylvania or in the State of Nebraska or in any other State to beat up a man. That is against the law today. If "goons" can beat a man up for exercising his rights under State law, so they could under the Federal law. The point of the matter is that there is protection by law, even if the local officials will not meet their responsibility.

The Senator would not be filling a vacuum in this case by suggesting that these men are not protected. I cannot help it and the Senator cannot help it—and it is not the responsibility of the Senate—if the responsible law officials of a given area are so "gutless" that they will not give the man protection.

Mr. HOLLAND and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield first to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts on the first part of the premise, for I am sure no Senator would want to take away from any labor-union member, or from labor-union members as a group, as defined in the bill, residing in any State, any rights or protections they have under the laws of the State.

Is it not true that a plenary provision guarding against preemption, such as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, would completely guard against any such surrender of rights? Would it not make clear that all rights—and the rights may vary in the different States—would be preserved, but, at the same time, a field would be created, without fear of preemption, under which by Federal law, passed by the Congress, there would be protections provided more sweeping than those provided in at least several of the States?

I am sure the Members of the Senate want to protect the members of labor unions.

Mr. KENNEDY. Which would govern, the Federal or the State law? In a case where a member's rights were in question in regard to freedom of assembly, or in regard to an election, which law would govern?

Mr. HOLLAND. I would say that both rights would prevail, that both courts would be available, and both remedies would be available. Any plenary provision against preemption would certainly preserve States' rights as they are, and it would, at the same time, create a new body of effective Federal law.

Mr. KENNEDY. In that case, there would be three protections.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I may conclude the statement—and I apologize for taking so long—there is nothing new in the idea of concurrent legislation or concurrent protection of rights, whether it be on the basis of private rights or on the basis of criminal law. It seems to me that the Senate, confronted with the great body of evidence, taken so ably by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas and by his distinguished associates, including the Senator from Massachusetts, and confronted by a clear showing of all the abuses which have taken place, notwithstanding undoubtedly good provisions in State laws in various States, and perhaps in all States, should realize there are rights which need to be protected. We should want—and I believe the Senate will show it wants—to protect more fully rights which frequently have been abused and violated under the conditions which now prevail.

Mr. KENNEDY. It seems to me the question before us involves a burden of evidence upon the Members of the Senate who support the bill to show that there are adequate remedies today available in all these areas.

In my opinion, the proposed legislation is somewhat confining. In the case I mentioned there would be three remedies. One would be provided under the bill, when the Secretary of Labor could set the election aside because there was not freedom for the members to participate fairly in the election.

There would also be a Federal remedy and a local remedy in some cases conflicting.

I will say to the Senator that I am not sure he would accept the general thesis that all rights of all citizens of the United States which may be denied should be carried to the courts by a Federal official, either the Attorney General or the Secretary of Labor. Does the Senator agree to that?

Mr. HOLLAND. I certainly would agree with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts but I do not think the distinguished Senator would disagree with me when I say that the actions and the findings of the McClellan committee have shown beyond any peradventure of doubt that there are a tremendous number of abuses of private rights now being perpetrated and that there is a need for giving greater protection against violations of those rights. Does not the Senator feel that way about it?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator that I am not convinced he accepts the general thesis that the Federal Government should protect private rights and be the party to initiate proceedings in courts in all cases when private rights may be denied and when there may be ample evidence that such private rights are denied.

We had a long debate on this whole question with regard to title III of the civil rights bill and whether the Attorney General would be the proper person to initiate suits on behalf of individuals throughout the country. It seems to me that serves as a quite comparable example and precedent.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more observation?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. It seems to me that the bill so ably supported by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts demonstrates that he recognizes the need for the protection of the rights now being violated. The Senator provides for that in section 506 (a) and (b) of his bill, and, insofar as it goes, I approve of it.

The question which the distinguished Senator from Arkansas has raised—and I think he has raised it soundly—is that the findings of his committee and the evidence which has been brought out by that committee, and which has shocked the Nation, have shown abuses of private rights and abuses of individuals in many other fields than those now mentioned in the bill. The Senator from Florida feels that in order to do a full job we have to go a great deal farther than is provided in the bill. I should like to know how the Senator from Massachusetts feels about that.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator from Florida accept the general thesis that on occasions when evidence can be obtained that private citizens find it difficult to obtain justice by themselves in the State courts, the Federal Government, the Attorney General, or the Secretary of Labor should prosecute such cases?

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not wish to be other than responsive but my feeling is that there is a field which certainly calls for enactment of some Federal law.

My feeling also is that there is a showing that State law is inadequate. The State of New York, by the enactment a few days ago of an act in this very field, has shown that its legislature has all the facts. I am sure that is largely the result of the findings and activities of the McClellan committee. There is something that appeals to it as requiring State action to protect further private rights than those which are protected under present law.

I cannot feel that the distinguished Senator can argue very strongly against the proposition that additional Federal protection is needed, when he has written into his bill, under sections 506 (a) and (b) strong criminal provisions, culminating in subsection (c), which applies a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both, for the abuse and violation of rights recognized by the bill, but which have not been recognized heretofore by Federal law.

The whole question between the distinguished Senator and myself is whether his bill goes far enough. It is my distinct feeling—and it was my feeling last year when this question was debated on the floor of the Senate—that the bill does not go far enough. If necessary, I could relate several things which happened in the course of a campaign which I conducted last year, in which I was approached by many labor union members who felt that they were extremely ill-treated, and I agree with them. They made it clear that they were not being protected by State law in my State, or by existing Federal law.

We want to go further than the distinguished Senator has suggested. I pay tribute to him for going as far as he has gone. I am sure he feels that that is as far as he should go. I am also sure that there is a field for disagreement on this subject.

I believe the Senator from Arkansas is exactly correct when he says that we should go further in declaring the existence of rights in this field which may not be abused or violated without the offenders getting into difficulty.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator from Massachusetts has provided, in section 506, for penalties for violation of the rights mentioned in the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Has the Senator preempted the State courts in the protection of those rights, which he seeks to protect by criminal penalty?

Mr. KENNEDY. We have not, but there is a great deal of difference between the rights we have sought to guarantee and the rights which the Senator mentions, in the entire field of the Bill of Rights

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the Senator's bill does not cover such rights, I am glad to have that information. They are basic.

Mr. KENNEDY. The point is that I think they are adequately covered by State law, by the Taft-Hartley Act, or by the bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I suggest at this point that the Senator read subparagraph 5 on page 3, under the heading "Protection of the Right To Sue." Does not that cover what the Senator has been discussing? Does not the amendment I have offered cover the situation in Pennsylvania which has been mentioned?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will give the Senator an answer after I have dealt with subparagraph 4. I wish to go through the various paragraphs one by one. Subparagraph 4 is headed "Freedom From Arbitrary Financial Exactions." Every Member of the Senate feels that such freedom should be guaranteed. As a matter of fact, it is guaranteed by the Taft-Hartley Act. I read from section 8(b)5 of the Taft-Hartley law:

(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

(5) To require of employees covered by an agreement authorized under subsection (a) (3) the payment, as a condition precedent to becoming a member of such organization, of a fee in an amount which the Board finds excessive or discriminatory under all the circumstances.

If Members of the Senate will go through the so-called Bill of Rights section by section, they will find that such rights are dealt with more effectively under State law, under the Taft-Hartley Act, or under the pending bill. It is not that we seek to deny freedom of speech to union members. The fact is that the basic principle is that if this amendment is adopted, I believe that rights which have been guaranteed by the States over a long period of time will be limited.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I have a few questions to ask the chairman of the subcommittee, for purposes of clarification, in order to make a legislative record on the bill.

As I understand the chairman of the subcommittee, he takes the position that the McClellan amendment is not necessary. Is that one of the positions the Senator takes?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Oregon is correct.

Mr. MORSE. And that in his opinion it is not necessary for at least the following reasons: First, that the objectives of the amendment are now adequately covered by State law, and it is up to the local jurisdictions to guarantee the rights of citizens under State laws. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. Second, the amendment is not necessary because the chairman takes the position that if we enact the Kennedy-Ervin bill in its present form, and give a trial to the democratic procedures included in that bill, we shall discover that many of the problems which worry the Senator from Arkansas and others who wish to adopt this type of amendment would vanish, because we think we have in the bill the procedural safeguards which will have the result, in instances in which that situation does not now exist, of returning control of the unions to the membership of the unions, and taking the control, in such instances as that situation exists, away from racketeers and men who have betrayed their public trust with respect to the public and members of the unions.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. In the third place, the chairman of the subcommittee feels that this amendment is not necessary because already, under the Taft-Hartley law, which was just quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts, there is adequate protection if the States, in turn, will carry out the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law in this particular field.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. Lastly, do I correctly understand my chairman to say, in effect, that he thinks the McClellan amendment is unnecessary because in the Kennedy-Ervin bill we would give such authority to the Secretary of Labor as to make him, shall I say, for want of a better term, somewhat of a surveillance officer over unions; that under the terms of our bill he will be effective in eliminating from union practices some of the very abuses which our friend from Arkansas has in mind, which he thinks require his amendment in order to eliminate, whereas we say, "Let us try the procedure we have proposed to see if it works. We think it will work successfully." Is that the position of the chairman?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. As the chairman knows, time and time again in the committee I have taken the position, under his leadership, that we have the duty in this session of Congress to come forward with a bill which will contain the minimum checks which the Federal Government ought always to try to impose when in the opinion of the Federal Government they are necessary to eliminate abuses; but that under our Federal system we should bear in mind that the Federal Government should adopt a policy of exercising only the minimum checks, and should not proceed, in any field, to enact laws so broad in scope that, in effect, they constitute a superseding of State jurisdiction and State obligation, to the end of weakening our system of Government, under which we look to the States, after all, to handle local problems in the first instance. Does the Senator share that point of view?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. Therefore, in the bill we have tried to avoid the inclusion of sections in which Congress would make the Secretary of Labor its agent and have him determine for the unions their constitutional provisions and their by-law provisions, and, in effect, run the internal affairs of the unions; rather, we seek to guarantee by law that the membership of the local unions will have the right and authority to function as democratic members of a voluntary organization known as a labor organization. We should not go so far as is proposed by the McClellan amendment and other amendments which are being offered to the bill, which would make Congress a constitutional convention for the free labor movement in the United States. Does the Senator share my point of view?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do.

Mr. MORSE. For that reason I shall support the position of the Senator from Massachusetts and shall vote against the McClellan amendment.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I am very much interested in the Senator's comment on section 103; which reads:

SEC. 103. The Secretary—

I assume that here is meant the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. I read:

SEC. 103. The Secretary, whenever it shall appear that any person has violated or is about to violate any of the provisions in this title, may bring an action in a district court or other court of the United States—

When any such action as is here described is brought, who represents the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Attorney General.

Mr. CARROLL. The Attorney General of the United States?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. Then if we now agree to this amendment we are conferring a power on the Secretary of Labor and the Attorney General of the United States to institute suits in behalf of private plaintiffs—for such relief as may be appropriate, including, but without limitation, injunctions to restrain any such violation—

And so forth. I thought we crossed that bridge 2 years ago. I remember the great debate on the floor of the Senate about instituting the supposedly new device of injunction proceedings without a jury trial. Here I find a provision in the McClellan amendment offered to a bill not dealing with constitutional democracy, not dealing with political democracy, but dealing with economic democracy. I wonder why proponents of this amendment were unwilling to accept a parallel remedy to enforce the most basic constitutional rights of citizens.

I was very much interested in the comments of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I had missed the full import of this important provision of the amendment. May I ask the Senator if I have overstated the case?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Colorado has stated the case much more precisely than I did. As one who voted for the jury trial amendment, embodying title IV of the civil rights bill of 2 years ago, I believe it is a matter which should be given careful consideration by all Members of the Senate. Now it is proposed to repose in the Attorney General the power to obtain injunctions against any citizen of the United States, to protect any rights of the 15 million union members in the country, but we would not provide jury trials in suits affecting the exercise of those broad rights.

Mr. CARROLL. They are economic rights, as I have said. They arise from economic problems and deal with economic democracy. They are not constitutional rights arising under the 14th amendment, dealing with political democracy.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Massachusetts has expressed the fear that if the McClellan amendment is adopted the Federal Government will have preempted the field of enforcement, and thus will have excluded the States from entering it.

Mr. KENNEDY. There is a danger of that, I said.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes. Is not that fear also applicable to the bill which the Senator from Massachusetts has reported?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not believe so.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What is the distinction? Why should the McClellan substitute be subject to attack on the ground that it has preempted a field, and why should the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts be not subject to the same fear?

Mr. KENNEDY. Because I believe we have established certain precise rights. In the case of elections we preempt action for the Federal Government after the election is held. A suit may be filed in a State court prior to an election. The Federal Government takes preemption after an election. We have attempted to exercise Federal rights in those areas where the Federal Government can best do the job, and have attempted to provide for State preemption in the areas where the State can do it best. I cannot give a better example than to cite the procedure followed in the case of union elections. Prior to the day of an election an individual can sue in a State. The day after an election the Secretary of Labor assumes jurisdiction.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Under section 507 of the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts an attempt is made to negate preemption by the Federal Government by specifically stating that the enforcement of State criminal laws shall not be impeded by the passage of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There is nothing in section 507 which negates the preemption on civil rights.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Massachusetts makes an attack upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas on the ground that it would preempt jurisdiction on civil rights, but does not concede that the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts equally would preempt jurisdiction on civil rights.

Mr. KENNEDY. The reason I do not concede it is that it does not do so. In the areas where the Federal Government should assume jurisdiction, the Federal Government assumes jurisdiction and preempts the field. In the areas where we do not believe the Federal Government should assume jurisdiction, and where the States can do the job better, the bill quite clearly does not preempt that field for the Federal Government.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Arkansas states that his amendment will not preempt the field. To safeguard the matter he has offered an amendment which would definitely preclude preemption. I respectfully submit that neither the Senator from Ohio nor the Senator from Massachusetts nor the Senator from Arkansas can predict what the Supreme Court will say has been or has not been preempted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am trying to hurry along, because I know an attempt is being made to get a unanimous consent agreement. I should like first to decide whether to offer an amendment and then agree to limit the time for debate and get a vote.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that I want to make something a Federal crime which is already covered by State law. I call the attention of my friend to his bill on the subject of embezzlement of union funds. I do not know of a State in the Union which does not make a crime of embezzlement of union funds. I do not know of a State in the Union which does not make a crime of embezzlement.

My friend from Massachusetts attempts to reenact State laws in section 109 of the bill, which provides:

Any person who embezzles, steals, or unlawfully and willingly abstracts or converts to his own use—

And so forth. Every State in the Union has a criminal statute on embezzlement. Why can we not also make the other crimes Federal crimes, inasmuch as we are dealing with Federal legislation in the labor union area? My friend suggests that we would weaken the bill by doing that. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the section on page 25 of the bill dealing with picketing. We already have on the books the Hobbs Act, which deals with extortion. It provides for a penalty of 20 years in jail. The Senator now proposes to reduce the penalty for the same crime to 2 years. The Attorney General has stated that the bill would make this crime a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, and a fine of not more than $10,000. Under the Hobbs Act, the penalty is imprisonment for 20 years. The Attorney General also points out that all States now have laws regarding extortion.

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall be glad to answer the Senator from Arkansas. The embezzlement section was put in the bill last year, and wisely so, on the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas. I think it is effective to have both State and Federal statutes apply. We do not preempt the criminal laws of States. I am appreciative of the fact that the Senator from Arkansas last year persuaded us to make embezzlement of union funds a Federal crime.

The second point I wish to answer is with regard to the Hobbs Act. That question has been before us in the same language for 15 months. The Department of Justice, 2 days ago, decided that such a provision might weaken the effect of the Hobbs Act.

The reason it was put in was that there is some question in the minds of many lawyers whether the Hobbs Act operates if there is no violence. So in order to make certain that it would cover peaceful picketing, even for lawful purposes, this section was included in order to take care of the question raised by the Department of Justice.

Yesterday I sent to the desk an amendment making the crime a misdemeanor, and reducing the penalty from 10 years to 5 years. However, it does not affect the argument against preemption.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Has not the Senator from Massachusetts given us a perfect illustration of the existence, under his bill, of a concurrent jurisdictional matter, in which both the State and Federal Governments would be given authority to deal with a bad situation? The Senator does not seem to be disturbed by that fact, but is satisfied with his provision against preemption, with which I, too, am satisfied.

How does the Senator differentiate between that action as suggested by him and the broader action as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, in the event the conscience of the Senate determines, as I think it will, that the evidence taken by the McClellan committee points to the necessity for correcting a great many abuses not corrected by the Senator's bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. We make a crime of embezzlement both on the local basis and the Federal basis. This is a quite precise crime. There is no difficulty in defining it. We are talking about a broad area of major rights, stretching over six areas of human action. That raises in a different way the question of preemption or the question of embezzlement.

Speaking about consistency, I stood on the floor of the Senate and voted for jury trials in all cases of injunction with respect to voting rights. Yet the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would deny the right of jury trial in all cases involving the rights of millions of Americans if the Secretary of Labor gets an injunction. I do not see how any Senator who voted for the right of jury trial in voting cases can deny the right of all these citizens to a jury trial.

As to those who voted against the right of the Attorney General to seek injunctions in cases, as the Senator from Colorado has said, involving rights under the Constitution, I fail to see how they can consistently turn over to the Attorney General the power to use the injunctive process in cases involving all the rights in this broad area.

Mr. HOLLAND. I say there is a considerable difference, because this is a field in which the evidence before the Senate and before the people—and it has shocked the people—shows clearly that individuals at the lowest possible level have been imposed upon by organizations created and largely functioning under Federal law.

In the field of public schools, we are talking about something as to which the States have the right to exert the power. We are talking about a field completely different from the one in which the labor unions of the Nation have been governed by Federal legislation, which in too many instances has become exclusive in its operation.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I was one of the advocates of part 3 in the fight for a sound civil rights bill in 1957. I believe the Attorney General should have the right to intervene. I believe the Attorney General should have the right to go to court on questions involving the right to vote, and to represent the people in a Federal court.

I am not so much worried about granting this authority to the Secretary of Labor, but I do want to read and consider this language about equal rights:

> Every member of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization, including identical voting rights and equal protection of its rules and regulations.

Let us take up those points one by one. What is wrong with this provision? Why should we not vote for it. Suppose there were only that one section of the amendment and we gave to the Secretary of Labor the right to call upon the Attorney General to go into Federal court to protect those fundamental rights. I ask this question in all sincerity, because many Senators who voted for part 3 of the civil rights bill have asked themselves the question. Now we ask it on this item. Is the doctrine of preemption involved in it? If so, how?

Mr. KENNEDY. Probably the only weakness in this section, but it is an important one—involves putting the Secretary of Labor into the adjustment of matters such as equal rights and privileges within a labor organization. I should think that would involve the Secretary of Labor in criminal offense procedures, seniority disputes, and any other matter as to which any member of a union may feel he has been discriminated against by union officers or his employer while he was a member of a union.

My own feeling is that these are matters with which the union can deal better, on the assumption, as we have heard it said frequently, that there are honest people in the unions.

I am reluctant to have the Secretary of Labor and the Attorney General become involved in all matters which may be considered when we talk about equal protection of rules and regulations and equal rights and privileges. That is my only objection to this section. If the Senate wants to adopt it, I am sure it is a section which, while it may make the Secretary of Labor extremely busy, will not cause undue hardship on anyone but him.

Mr. CARROLL. As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. The thought occurs to me that the Federal court dockets are clogged today. There is a great clamor to have 40 or 50 new judges appointed. To load upon the courts the great burden which could result from enacting this amendment is something to which serious thought should be given, should it not?

The first section of the bill, section 101, provides that every member of a labor organization shall have equal rights. Does every member have a forum today to enforce his equal rights?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. What forum does he have today?

Mr. KENNEDY. In order to enforce his rights?

Mr. CARROLL. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should say, first, that he has the procedures of his union. If they are denied to him, I think the court decisions—and I have a great many of them here; in fact——

Mr. CARROLL. What court decisions? Decisions of State courts?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes, State courts. I quote Prof. Clyde W. Summers, of the Yale Law School, probably the outstanding authority in the country on union discipline. In an article published in the Harvard Law Review for May 1951, Professor Summers said:

> The courts have reciprocated by looking with a jaundiced eye upon all discipline which restricts the member's freedom to use the judicial process and, in these flagrant cases, have freely protected the individual member from discipline. Even in more doubtful cases in which members have sought to enjoin the levying of assessments or the calling of strikes on the claim that the union action was unconstitutional or illegal, the courts have also given full protection.

Professor Summers then cites numerous cases in which the civil courts have protected political activities outside unions, political activities inside unions, suits against unions, dual unionism, and so forth.

I suggest that any Senator who is concerned about whether there have been voluminous laws and decisions in the States which have the force of precedent should look at the cases which are included in this article, which show the broad protections which are given to union members by State courts for any breach of their right to speak, against being expelled from unions, and against excessive fines.

Mr. CARROLL. Does it include freedom of assembly?

Mr. KENNEDY. It includes freedom of assembly.

Mr. CARROLL. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts that present State and Federal laws are adequate and that the pending bill is adequate to protect the rights of working people?

Mr. KENNEDY. Except in one particular, namely, that of guaranteeing that every member of a union shall have the right to vote in a secret election, after due notice, and that everyone who is a candidate for officer of a union shall have the right to name a teller. When unfairness is committed in an election, the Secretary of Labor shall have the right to set the election aside. I do not think State law provides adequate remedies in this field, whereas the bill does.

When unfairness is committed in an election, the bill provides that the Secretary of Labor shall have the right to set the election aside. I do not think State laws provide adequate remedies in that field; and, for that reason, this bill does.

Mr. CARROLL. I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] have in their bill provisions which are corrective.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct; in the provisions on voting rights, for instance, on page 36, in lines 1 and 2.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have noted that the Senator from Massachusetts has included in his bill, on page 23, in section 110(c), language similar to that the Senator from Arkansas has suggested in his amendment on the question of the bringing of injunction suits by the Secretary of Labor.

I read from the Senator's bill:

(c) The Secretary, whenever it shall appear that any person has violated or is about to violate any of the provisions of this title, or any rule or regulation of the Secretary promulgated hereunder, may bring an action in a district court or other court of the United States for such relief as may be appropriate including, but without limitation, injunctions to restrain any such violations and to compel compliance with this title, and with rules and regulations issued thereunder. Any such action against a labor organization may be brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia or in the district court or other court of the United States where the violation occurred.

As a matter of fact, the Senator's own words go a great deal farther than the words suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, except as to the field of coverage. As to the field of coverage, the Senator's bill is more limited. But the Senator from Massachusetts includes in his bill not only a provision for an injunction to enforce the provisions of the bill, but also a provision to enforce "any rule or regulation of the Secretary promulgated hereunder."

So it seems to me that the entire question here, again, is one of degree and of how much territory shall be covered.

I believe the Senate certainly has knowledge of the fact that there have been serious abuses and serious violations of the individual rights and destruction of the individual property rights, and even of the right to live, of members of unions, and that those matters have not been adequately dealt with in the State courts. So I believe that a provision for the creation of a concurrent remedy to deal with those matters adequately, under Federal law, should not be too difficult for the Senator from Massachusetts to accept, because, as I have pointed out, in his own bill he has included exactly the same language in the case of enforcement of the rules of the Secretary of Labor, in addition to the rules set forth in the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall be glad to answer.

Mr. HOLLAND. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts do so.

Mr. KENNEDY. What we are dealing with on page 23, in subsection (c) is that the Secretary shall have the right to obtain an injunction to compel people to file—which is entirely different from securing injunctions for the protection of private rights in these various fields. I think there is a good deal of difference.

I will say to the Senator from Florida—because in my opinion no one has more courage than does he—that, as he knows, he was particularly interested, as I was, in protecting the civil rights of people in connection with the jury-trial provision. So, when he has examined with care this problem, which relates to another area, I believe he will feel that what is left in title IV, in connection with the protection of jury trials, is sufficient; and I believe that he, himself, will feel that consistency should be followed and should guide his conduct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will yield further, let me ask whether he will propose an amendment to protect jury trial rights in connection with the injunction suits for which he has made provision in his bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. There seems to me to be no comparison between giving the Secretary of Labor the power to obtain an injunction, in order to cause a union officer to file a report under this title—which is all this title does—and requiring the Secretary of Labor to enforce all the so-called bill of rights, on a private basis, all over the country, by private suits, in fact. I do not see the comparison between giving the Secretary of Labor the power to compel a union officer to make a financial report or giving the Secretary of Labor the power to obtain an injunction if such an officer does not do so, and having the Secretary of Labor initiate suits on behalf of 15 million Americans, potentially, in this whole variety of areas. The two seem to me to be quite different.

Mr. HOLLAND. It seems to me that the Senator's provision applies to an election.

Mr. KENNEDY. No; it does not. We are talking about the first title.

Mr. HOLLAND. Furthermore, it seems to me to be very clear, again, that the question is one of degree.

I do not believe that the Senator from Massachusetts would seriously on the floor of the Senate take the position that the hearings held by the McClellan committee have not disclosed with complete clarity that the State laws are not adequate and have not been proven adequate to take care of the many abuses which have existed.

The very fact that the Senator from Massachusetts proposes a remedy and a change and the setting up of Federal procedures shows that he himself has come to that conclusion. So I hope he will be patient enough to bear with some of us who would go further than he would, because we feel that the remedy he proposes does not begin to deal with the enormity of the situation which has been disclosed by the McClellan committee.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to yield to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], first of all to ascertain whether he is going to offer his amendment to the pending amendment, and second, to ascertain whether at this time we can contrive to arrive at a limitation on debate on the pending question.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, at this very time I am trying to obtain the floor for that purpose; and then I shall agree to a limitation on the time available for debate—if the Senator from Illinois will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, I submit a modification of my amendment, and I send the modification to the desk. It reads as follows:

Except as explicitly provided to the contrary, nothing in this Act shall reduce or limit the responsibilities of any labor organization or any officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization, or of any trust in which a labor organization is interested, under any other Federal law or under the laws of any State, and except as explicitly provided to the contrary, nothing in this Act shall take away any right or bar any remedy to which members of a labor organization are entitled under such other Federal law or law of any State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Inasmuch as the yeas and nays have already been ordered on the question of agreeing to the pending amendment, it can be modified at this time only by unanimous consent.

Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the amendment is modified accordingly.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, now I am glad to agree to a time certain for the vote to be taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the vote on the pending amendment and any amendments thereto begin at 6 o'clock, and that the time between now and 6 o'clock be equally divided, and be controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I should like to take a few moments to discuss some of the questions which have been debated during the last few minutes.

First, let me say that I believe we must ask ourselves what are the issues we are considering.

While discussing legislation of this type, Mr. President, it is very easy, in this legalistic complex, to get away from the excellent and the stirring presentation the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] made this afternoon.

The answer simply is that our legal processes have broken down in respect to enforcement of the rights which human beings are guaranteed, not only by the Constitution of the United States, but which I personally believe every human being is guaranteed by God.

A few minutes ago, the Senator from Oregon stated that the purpose of the bill is to put into effect certain minimum legislation. Mr. President, as one who has supported all the civil rights bills proposed during my tenure of office, I wish to state that in the field of personal rights there can be no minimum legislation.

The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas guarantees several rights, but today every one of those rights is either implicitly or impliedly guaranteed to each citizen by the constitution of his own State and by the Constitution of the United States. I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts will agree as to that.

Then, Mr. President, why are we considering the enactment of such legislation? We are doing so because we believe that the disclosures before the McClellan committee have shown the Senate and the people of the United States that there is within the labor movement—no matter whether confined to a small portion of it or not—a cancerous growth which ultimately can destroy the labor movement and perhaps ultimately can destroy the economy of our country. I have read in the newspapers that one union official said he would honor boycotts in this country by workers of Russia. That statement is typical of the attitude which has developed in the illegal area of trade unionism.

I would not willingly or knowingly stand on the floor of the Senate and seek to take away from any laboring man any one of the privileges which gives him the right to continue to bargain collectively or freely. Nor would I knowingly take one step back to the coercive situation in which workers found themselves 30 years ago.

So when we talk about minimum laws, let it be clear it is not my purpose to help enact any minimum laws with respect to any human or personal rights. Human rights and economic rights cannot be separated, because all economic rights lead back to personal rights.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has quoted a legal authority from Yale. There is no doubt that many of such cases have been decided by State courts. There is no doubt that many such cases have been decided by the Federal courts. The Senator was referring to cases which were decided. I hope that by so citing the cases, he is not trying to hold them up as an example of the law enforcement we have had in this country with respect to human rights. If he is, I wonder what he and the McClellan committee have been doing during the past 2 years. I know they have been working. I know they, including the Senator from Massachusetts, have worked under great trial and tribulation.

In my opinion, we must adopt this amendment. As the Senator has created in his own bill, a coexisting State and Federal jurisdiction, so the Senate must create coexisting State and Federal rights. I intend to support the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am very glad to yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). The Senator from Arizona is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I think we could find in the history of our Constitution and the Bill of Rights precedent for what we are confronted with today. It will be recalled that when the Constitution was written and completed, the Founding Fathers who wrote that document said, "In the future there may come a time in our history when people may not recognize the rights they have." So they prepared the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, and those amendments are known as the Bill of Rights.

I suggest to my colleagues we are in very much the same position. In the past 50 years laws have been written to protect the rights of the working people of the United States. Now we have reached a point where we need to spell out those rights and incorporate them in what we may call a bill of rights, just as the Senator from Arkansas has called his amendment a bill of rights for members of labor organizations.

Mr. President, far better than I can express the thought are the words of Mr. Godfrey P. Schmidt, who was one of the three court-appointed monitors named to clean up the Teamsters Union. He is a professor of constitutional law at Fordham University. I should like to read into the RECORD, in support of the McClellan suggestion of a bill of rights, a part of the letter which Mr. Schmidt wrote to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] on February 9, 1959, which letter was made a part of the hearings. Mr. Schmidt wrote in part:

> One of the most rampant abuses of power in the labor movement, consists in the practice of visiting reprisals upon union members and officials who dare to exercise free speech in opposition to the wishes of the programs of powerful labor leaders. The Wagner Act long ago forbade reprisals by employers against workers who indulged in concerted activities. The measures of proof in such cases is a fair preponderance of the evidence. The labor boards have, with great solicitude, pursued employers who make use of reprisals against workers. The law should forbid the much more ruthless and extensive reprisals by labor leaders against the rank-and-file members and officers. The boards should use the same meticulous solicitude to prevent this type tyranny (which is breeding a dangerous servility in rank-and-file members) as it has used to punish employer tyranny. It is no answer to say (as I think Professor Cox said) that we have criminal laws on our books to prevent and to punish threats and coercion. Such laws are usually inefficacious for the purpose I have in mind; because their measure of proof is proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Threats and coercion have become so commonplace and widespread in the union movement as to suggest Fascist oppression and a faceless way of life for the rank-and-file worker. You asked me why the Teamsters membership have not risen up to oust the criminals from their union and to purge it of corrupt practices.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arizona has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. May I have 3 more minutes?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 3 more minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I continue to read from the letter:

> Any rank-and-file member (who will talk frankly and courageously and who has not been brainwashed by the ceaseless union-leader propaganda) can give you the answer. He is afraid to protest. He is afraid to stand up and say what is on his mind in a union hall. If he does, he incurs the peril of personal violence, of threats, and of a whole series of pressures ranging from frankly brutal to hypocritically subtle. He has been given no indication by Congress, the courts, and the law enforcement agencies that he has much of a chance to come off successfully if he enter the unequaled struggle against labor leaders. The latter have unlimited expense accounts, large union treasuries which they use as their own facilities, competent and often devious lawyers, paid out of union treasuries, a horde of actual or potential investigators and goon squads to take care of the more recalcitrant cases. The worker stands alone against and unprotected from the union boss who is often feared more than any company boss. He must depend upon free legal advice given sporadically, or he must pay his own legal bills. The point is that a new unfair labor practice of labor leaders should be defined for the purpose of guaranteeing workers free speech and a bill of rights and freedom from reprisals when their views collide with those of their leaders. Your bill would, I think, be unacceptable and inefficient precisely because it fails to take care of this most important abuse.

In closing, I will say Mr. Schmidt was referring to the original Kennedy-Ervin, bill, the language of which is contained in the new version, S. 1555.

I agree completely with the chairman of the rackets committee that a bill of rights is needed. I think it is long overdue. I think it is time the American Congress stood on its feet and had the courage to protect the rights of American workers and to stop the kicking around of workingmen by the union bosses.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield time to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ERVIN. I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; I yield time to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Knowing of the Senator's interest in protecting the right of trial by jury in criminal contempt cases, I wonder if the Senator will agree to modify his amendment by including, at the end of line 5, on page 6, the following language——

Mr. McCLELLAN. I wonder if the Senator will submit the language to me? I will consider it, and see what can be worked out, without using any more of my time now.

Mr. ERVIN. Since this is in my own handwriting and I write so poorly, perhaps I had better read it privately to the Senator.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time taken to call the roll not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I suggest the absence of a quorum because no speaker seems to be available at the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does any Senator yield time to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator.

I simply want to use this time, Mr. President, to say that I am sure any Senator who heard the stirring, persuasive, and factual presentation of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] as to the necessity for guaranteeing these democratic rights to the rank and file members of trade unions, who have found these American privileges denied them, will feel impelled to vote for the proposal.

I also wish to say, in response to the statement by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who quoted from a very eminent college professor of Yale University, who wrote an article pointing out that there were many laws and many provisions protecting trade union members in their rights, that this undoubtedly is accurate and is a beautiful theory, but for more than 24 months our committee has been investigating violations which occur under the laws and rules which now prevail. Man after man has been before the committee to complain about the fact that he has been intimidated, that he has been beaten up, that there has been violence against his property or against his person, and so on, simply because there is not now adequate protection in the law, either at the State level or the Federal level.

I recall three badly beaten up members of the Maritime Union who came to my office one day for the precise purpose of asking to be placed under a Federal subpena. I said, "Why do you want this? Do you want to testify before the committee?"

They said, "No; we do not want to testify before the committee, but we are trying to throw out some crooked officers of our local at the docks. Every time we go to a meetinghall or go out on the docks we get beaten up. That happened two nights before. We heard the chairman of your committee on television the other day, when he said to witnesses, 'If you are being intimidated, if you come forward we will put you under a subpoena for a while and you can report back to us anybody who is trying to take recriminatory action against you.' If we can get protection of that kind by Federal subpoena or from the FBI, we can campaign among our fellow union members and we can win the election against the crooks."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to grant me 1 additional minute?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 1 additional minute.

Mr. MUNDT. I said, "Of course, we cannot give you a Federal subpena for that purpose, but I admire your courage and I admire your Americanism in trying to carry your position to your fellow union members."

If we had a Federal law containing the provision which is under consideration, I seriously doubt, in the first place, that those men would have been beaten up, but if they had been beaten up they would have had recourse to the courts, for protection of their rights as Americans, and they could have campaigned within their own union for a cause which or for a candidate who they felt would be to the best interest of the union members.

Certainly if the Senate is interested in doing something to protect the rights and privileges of the rank and file duespaying members of American unions we can do it now, on the yea and nay vote, by supporting the McClellan amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to use some of his time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President do I correctly understand that I have a half hour remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Presiding Officer inform me how much time I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 27 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. How much time does the Senator from Arkansas have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would be prepared to yield back all of my time but 10 minutes, if that is agreeable. Then the Senator and I would each have 10 minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have two requests for time. One of them I will not be able to accommodate. I wanted to yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. KENNEDY. I will yield 4 minutes of my time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I cannot yield back any of my time. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] would like to have 10 minutes; the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] would like to have 10 minutes; the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] would like to have 4 or 5 minutes; the Senator from New York would like to have 3 or 4 minutes; and I would like to have about 5 minutes. I am prepared to yield 10 minutes to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], and I will yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator. Ten minutes will be sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 5, line 18, to strike out the words "section 101" and to insert in lieu thereof "this act."

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, a point of order. Is this an amendment to the McClellan amendment, which is pending, or an amendment to the bill?

Mr. PROUTY. It is an amendment to the McClellan amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, is the amendment in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is in order and to it the limitation of debate is applicable, the time being given on the McClellan amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, section 506 as it is now written makes it unlawful to fine, suspend, or expel a union member for exercising any right to which he is entitled under this act or to restrain, coerce, or intimidate him through the use of force or violence.

However, the bill does not make it unlawful to deny a member's rights simply by ignoring them or in any other manner which does not involve the threat of or the use of force or violence or a fine or some other disciplinary action against the member.

Section 301 of the act gives certain rights to union members with regard to the conduct of elections. Section 301(b) provides, for example, that the union "shall comply with all reasonable requests of any candidate to distribute by mail or otherwise, at the candidate's expense, campaign literature in aid of such person's candidacy." This section also provides that election safeguards to assure a fair count of the ballots shall be provided and section 301(d) gives every member the right to vote for and to support or be a candidate for union office. There is no penalty, however, for any union officer, for example, who ignores these rights. If the candidate makes a request to have his campaign literature distributed and a union officer refuses to do so, no penalty is provided as the bill is now written. The same is true of a union officer who refuses to provide adequate election safeguards. Such acts are not unlawful unless the union member was fined or disciplined or was threatened with violence, or violence was used against him.

The bill now contains a gap which would permit union officers to ignore a member's rights as created by this bill. It is the purpose of my amendment to close this gap and make such action unlawful.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, may I examine the amendment while some other Senator is speaking?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, how much time did the Senator from Vermont use?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not see my distinguished compatriot from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] in the Chamber.

Mr. McCLELLAN. He said he would yield some time to the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I address these remarks very specially to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

When all is said and done, life is a compensatory thing; and that is true both with respect to government and every other institution in the country. Everything is on a quid pro quo basis.

Long ago, under the Wagner Act, we conferred certain rights and privileges upon labor organizations. That act has been amended from time to time.

Subsequently we enacted the Taft-Hartley Act. We provided tax exemptions for labor organizations; and the people, speaking through their elected representatives, are entitled to something in return.

What shall that something be? First of all, it must be equality, if the symbolism and the hope of this country stand for anything. That subject is treated in the first part of the McClellan so-called bill of rights.

The second item is free speech. I heard my distinguished friend from Massachusetts speak about free speech, but I shall never forget the occasion when two of my old high school classmates who were members of a union back home had to sneak into my home on a Sunday night and tell me what was going on in their own local.

When I asked, "Why don't you get up on your hind legs and speak your piece?" they answered, "Yes; and have something happen to us?"

I am not so naive as to believe that free speech is so easily attained in some of these organizations unless it is vouchsafed and safeguarded by something in Federal law.

We talk about exactions, heavy penalties, and impositions. I know of a local in Chicago—and I know it out of the mouth of the business agent himself, when he came to Washington—which put the initiatory fee and the dues so high that no one could get into the union.

Those are not abstract, academic things. They are practical matters. I have had to live with them, and I know something about them.

We talk about the right to sue. Unless it is safeguarded in every possible way, an element of timidity enters into the situation; and unless union members feel pretty sure of their ground, they will not resort to the courts to obtain enforcement of their rights.

We talk about discipline in unions. I remember a meeting which occurred on a Sunday morning. A small group got together and held a meeting. The union involved was a large local. This group did not like the president, and they suspended him for 99 years.

Long before the McClellan committee, I was familiar with a good many of these racketeering practices. In my humble judgment there is no other answer for them except the thesis which was laid down by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] when he appeared before the subcommittee on the labor-management reform bill. The hearings had closed nearly 2 weeks before his bill was introduced. I insisted to the chairman that he be heard, and the hearings were reopened. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas came before the subcommittee and made his statement.

He started from the broad premise that unless certain rights are safeguarded in the beginning, and the cleansing process takes place before the mischief is done, almost everything we do in the enforcement field will be in vain. I concur in that thesis. I share the conviction of the Senator from Arkansas, which has been built over a long period of time—225 days of hearings, at which more than 1,200 witnesses were heard. If the distinguished Senator from Arkansas is not familiar with what is going on, no other Member of this body is.

I believe that his thesis is correct. I think it is sound. I thought perhaps the chairman of the subcommittee would accept this bill of rights. I could not imagine that it would not be accepted. It may have had some imperfections in it, but it should have been accepted, because I cannot conceive that the Senate will vote to turn aside that which seems so basic, so fundamental, and so elemental.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield myself one minute, to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, if he will bear with me.

Is it not true that the Secretary of Labor, before the House committee opposed a bill of rights?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know what the Secretary opposed before the House committee. I did not hear him oppose any bill of rights on this side.

Mr. CLARK. It is my understanding that the Secretary of Labor does not desire a bill of rights in this legislation. I ask the minority leader to correct me if I am incorrect.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it can safely be said that the Secretary of Labor wants an adequate bill. That is the reason why I offered the substitute for title VI yesterday; but it could command only 24 votes out of a total of 98.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to inquire from whose time the Senator from Pennsylvania yielded himself some time to speak?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Massachusetts has asked me to represent him during his brief absence from the Chamber. I should like to inquire whether any other Senators desire some time to speak. The Senator from Massachusetts has indicated that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] desires some time. Are there any other Senators who desire some time to be yielded to them by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GORE. I desire some time on an unrelated subject.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 22 minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK. Has a unanimous-consent agreement been entered that the Senate will vote at 6 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be taken at 6 o'clock.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. CLARK. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Every Senator knows that this is a very difficult vote. The Senator from Arkansas has conducted exhaustive hearings and has put us everlastingly in his debt with the truly consequential work he has done for the country. We have said it many times.

It would be very easy to vote for his amendment. I would not be frank if I did not say that I should like very much to do so. However, I cannot do so as a lawyer. I believe my colleagues are entitled to know why I cannot vote for the amendment.

One point which has not been discussed at all is that we are dealing with a criminal statute. Section 102 of the amendment provides for a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or either.

Labor leaders are not popular in this country; and deservedly, Mr. President, some of them are unpopular. It is a fact, however, that before I, a lawyer, vote for a criminal statute I must be satisfied that I can in conscience vote for it. The section I have referred to, section 102 in the amendment, provides:

> Any officer or agent of any such labor organization, who, through use or abuse of authority—

And so forth. This could involve the taking of no action at all, no operative cause whatever. Use or abuse of what? We find, for example, this language:

> Any officer or agent of any such labor organization who, through use or abuse of authority * * * willfully interferes with—

The word "interferes" is used. Then on page 2, lines 4 and 5, the reference is to the expression of "any views, arguments, or opinions, regarding any matter," and so forth.

Suppose the presiding officer said to a union member, "Sit down, and await your turn." Is that to be made a felony?

I point out also that on page 4, line 22, provision is made for a written transcript of the hearing, by an impartial person or persons. Who? Appointed by whom? Passed on by what? Is a union officer to be at the risk of going before a jury because a jury is finally to decide that a person was or was not impartial? In addition to criminal penalties there is included the provision for injunction suits for 16 million people who would be subject to the law.

Mr. President, this is another labor bill entirely. It is not the Kennedy-Ervin labor bill. It is the labor bill of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

It is an attractive provision, as I said. I submitted a bill of rights myself. I believe that one is needed. However, I believe what is needed is one that is declaratory of law not one which makes law. What we have before us is a totally new labor bill. I would not be true to my oath as a Senator if I voted for it, attractive as it is and much as I should like to vote for it. However, I cannot vote for it because my conscience will not permit me to do so.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield a half minute to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I have offered to the McClellan amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the time being charged to either side. Several Senators who desire to speak are not present in the Chamber.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall certainly not object if I can have 3 or 4 minutes in which to reply after all the speeches have been concluded. I believe, as the sponsor of the amendment, I should have the privilege of closing the debate.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator still has 5 minutes, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must inform the Senators that the unanimous-consent agreement provides that a vote shall be taken at 6 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. Is that agreement subject to change by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is subject to change by unanimous consent; yes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, and that the time for the quorum call be not charged to the time on either sides, to permit a vote to be taken perhaps 2 or 3 minutes after 6 o'clock.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am under a time limitation, and I should not like to have the time extended for more than 5 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. How much time remains to the opposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifteen minutes in all remain.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, has the unanimous-consent request been withdrawn?

Mr. CLARK. I should like to explain to the Senator from Massachusetts, who has returned to the Chamber, that no speakers were available on the floor, and I have asked unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum. I now withdraw that unanimous-consent request and yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY. How much time remains in opposition to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fourteen minutes remain for debate. The Chair is obliged to inform the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Arkansas that only 14 minutes remain before 6 o'clock. Therefore provision should be made to divide the remaining time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Chair state that 14 minutes in all remain?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall be glad to take 4 minutes and permit the Senator from Massachusetts to use the remaining 10 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have a quorum call, with the time not charged to either side, so that Members of the Senate may hear the discussion during the last few minutes. This is a very important amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, what does that request mean? Does it mean that we will vote 14 minutes from now, plus the time it takes to call the quorum?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose this amendment. I have five reasons why I think the amendment is either poorly drafted or poorly conceived or will give less protection to union members than the present State laws or Federal laws provide.

First, on page 5, line 1, under the heading "Inspection of Membership Lists," the amendment provides that lists of members of the union shall open to inspection to anyone—to a Communist cell, to a group of dissident employees, to an unfavorable employer.

A union is a militant organization. It must be, for the protection of the rights of its members. I think it is highly unfair and unreasonable, in order to protect the rights of members, to provide that the lists of 15 million union members shall be made public.

In the bill itself we protect this basic principle by providing that in an election every candidate for election shall have the right to have his election material mailed out 30 days before the election, and that if the union refuses to comply with that provision, the Secretary of Labor shall set the election aside. It seems to me that that protects the rights of union members.

We also protect the right of the union to preserve its lists inviolate.

Second, I invite attention to page 4, section 6, "Safeguards Against Improper Disciplinary Action." Beginning on line 8, we read:

> No member of any such labor organization may be fined, suspended, expelled, or otherwise disciplined by such organization or any officer thereof except for breach of a published written rule of such organization which is not inconsistent with any of the provisions of this title.

In the case of Mr. Smith, in Tennessee, the Teamster official who bribed a judge, unless there were a specific prohibition against bribery of judicial officers written into the constitution of the union, then no union could take disciplinary action against officer or member guilty of bribery.

If a union officer were guilty of rape, unless a prohibition against rape were written into the union constitution, the union would be prohibited from taking any disciplinary action against an officer or member who committed such a crime.

It seems to me that we can trust union officers to run their affairs better than that.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the amendment's provisions which would have to be complied with by any union when it wished to take disciplinary action against any member—for instance, if it wished to fine a member $5 for late payment of dues. The amendment provides that disciplinary action may not be taken unless such a member has been served with a written copy of the provisions of the constitution and bylaws, and so forth, and unless he has been served with written specific charges, and has been given a reasonable time to prepare his defense, and has been afforded a full and fair hearing, and has been afforded final review on a written transcript of the hearing, and so forth. Those provisions would have to be complied with in the case of every union disciplinary action, regardless of its seriousness; and there would have to be a written transcript and a paid arbitrator—who might cost the union $150 a day. If such provisions do not constitute action by the Federal Government in reaching its hands into the disciplinary action of a union, and in doing so in a completely unnecessary way, I think it would be difficult to find language that would go farther in that respect.

Last of all, I point out that the pending amendment would give the Secretary of Labor power, through the Attorney General, to obtain injunctions against any personage in the Nation, on behalf of any of the 15 million union members who might feel that their rights had been abused.

I think any Member of the Senate who voted for the protection of jury trial rights and for the protection of the other civil rights of Americans would find it difficult to vote for section 103 of the amendment, in its present form.

Furthermore, Mr. President, let me say to the Senate that as a result of the modification of the amendment which was submitted a few minutes ago by the Senator from Arkansas, the amendment as it now stands would upset the carefully prepared provisions in regard to secret elections and trusteeships, as those provisions now appear in the bill.

Therefore, on every count—despite the fact that I know the Senator from Arkansas wishes to do the right thing and wishes to provide proper protection for union members, I believe that his amendment is badly drawn; and if his amendment were to be adopted, union members would have fewer rights, rather than more rights.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, does any time remain under the control of the opponents of the amendment? If so, I should like to have them use it now. I have only 4 minutes remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes remain under the control of the opponents of the amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then I ask that they now use the remainder of the time available to them. Thereafter, I wish to speak.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time available to our side.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, some of the arguments I have listened to this afternoon have been backed up by or have been based on less than the basis or backing up of any of the other many arguments I have heard during my 16 or 17 years of service in this Chamber.

We propose that the Secretary of Labor be allowed to obtain injunctions in order to prevent the doing of injustice to the dues-paying members of unions; but some Senators say that will be awful and will be making the Secretary an agent of the Congress. However, the same Senators include similar provisions in two sections of their own bill. We have copied word for word two sections of their own bill, down to the point of the injunction provision.

Why is it wrong to obtain an injunction to protect the rights of such workers? Why is it wrong to give the Secretary the right to bring a suit to secure an injunction to enforce the rules he makes? Is it better legislation and sounder legislation to state what the rights of such persons are, and then not give the Secretary the right to enforce them?

But if we do provide for enforcing them, and if this provision applies to union members, but does not give some benefit to a union boss, then some Senators condemn us.

I say that the union members have rights; and tonight we shall either protect them by legislative means, or Senators will vote against every dues-paying union member in the country who tonight is being exploited and abused. Senators must take their choice; no other issue is now before us.

Senators can argue about technicalities, including some I heard mentioned a moment ago; but let me say that never before have I heard so ridiculous an argument by one who has so much intelligence.

The distinguished Senator from New York said he could not vote for the amendment because his conscience would not let him do so. What is bothering his conscience, Mr. President? When we propose that if union members are being dealt with for some misconduct, and if some disciplinary action is being taken, they be given a right to have their case heard by an impartial person or persons, the Senator from New York says his conscience will not let him vote for such a provision because it is indefinite.

Listen to the next part of the amendment, Mr. President:

(i) agreed to by such organization and the accused, or (ii) designated by an independent arbitration or mediation association or board.

Mr. President, how can we arrive at a better way to be fair and to obtain honest adjudications than by having two men agree to let a third man settle their differences.

If such a provision is wrong, if it is an imposition, if it is unjust to union members, let Senators vote against it. But in dealing with such matters, I should like to find a more honest and a fairer way than to give the union and the accused the right to select the jury. That is what we do all the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I hope my amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, as modified. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] are absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] would each vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON]. If present and voting, the Senator from Illinois would vote "nay" and the Senator from Virginia would vote "yea."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Extension of GI Law Benefits to Korean Veterans

OF

HON. RALPH W. YARBOROUGH

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 22, 1959

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the Senate Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee was told recently that the educational training provided by the GI bills for World War II and the Korean conflict not only strengthened the productive power of our Nation, but enabled the veterans to earn more money, and, the witness added, "On the basis of additional income taxes which our Government collects on this added earning power, the cost of veterans education is paying better returns than any security listed on the New York Stock Exchange. Further, those added income tax payments will continue and will probably increase over the years."

Support for my proposal to extend the benefits of the Korean GI bill is coming in from a wide variety of quarters. I am pleased to say a great many people agree with me that this measure would be an investment in the future of our country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a group of articles from Army Times for April 4, 1959.

The first article, written by Larry Carney, was published under the headline "Four Educators Back GI and Korea Bills."

The second article was published under the heading "Hill Told 4-Year College Course Is About Finished."

The heading on the third article reads "GI, Korea Bills Necessary, Educators Report to Hill."

The fourth article was headed "Outdo Non-Veterans Scholastically—Vets Do Well in College, Survey Shows."

The final article was headed "Senator SPARKMAN Backs GI Bill."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOUR EDUCATORS BACK GI AND KOREAN BILLS

(By Larry Carney)

WASHINGTON. — Four leading educators spoke out last week against any reduction in the benefit formula of the proposed new cold war GI bill to make it more acceptable to budget cutters in Congress. In testimony before the Senate Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee, headed by Senator RALPH D. YARBOROUGH, Democrat, of Texas, the college administrators enthusiastically endorsed proposals to extend GI bill benefits to post-Korean ex-GI's.

Appearing before the subcommittee were Dr. Price Ashton, president of Ranger Junior College, Ranger, Tex.; Dr. Malcolm M. Willey, vice president, Minnesota University; Dr. Clarence B. Hilberry, president, Wayne State University; and Dr. Robert G. Bernreuter, dean of admissions, Pennsylvania State University.

At last week's hearings, Dr. Ashton told the subcommittee he felt the opinion of most educators in his State was that the World War II and Korean GI bills should definitely be extended. Amounts now paid are too low, he said, and if the amounts are reduced it would make it practically impossible for veterans with families to go to college.

The educational allowances proposed in the Yarborough measure "do not grant the same degree of economic assistance to today's veteran as these same dollar amounts did for the Korean veterans," Dr. Hilberry told the subcommittee. "Living costs have increased since 1952."

Hilberry is chairman of the Michigan Council of State College Presidents. He said he had conferred with the presidents of eight other State-supported institutions which make up the council and was presenting their ideas as well.

He added that costs have increased to the veteran and as a result, the sum that a veteran will receive under the proposed cold war bill will support a smaller portion of his education than it did 7 years ago.

Dr. Bernreuter said he was afraid that if the monthly formula was reduced veteran students would "have to supplement their incomes" with outside employment.

He said this would show up in their academic achievements. "Instead of being better students than the nonveterans, the general effect would be to make them poorer students than the nonveterans."

Bernreuter said that Penn State's policy of giving preference to veterans is based upon the results of research studies contrasting the accomplishments of veterans with nonveterans. He said that "a study which we have just completed shows that veterans at Penn State make better scholastic records than nonveterans."

He added veterans were more inclined to finish their education and were involved in fewer disciplinary incidents on the campus.

YARBOROUGH, in his opening remarks, said the big question before the subcommittee was whether some or all of the readjustment benefits granted to veterans of War II and the Korea conflict should be made available to the thousands of young Americans, who, because of the compulsory draft law, are required to serve in the Armed Forces during the cold war.

The Texas lawmaker said there is an urgent need to restore to our young citizen soldiers at least a portion of the opportunities lost by military service, particularly in the cases of lost educational opportunities.

He also urged passage of his bill for post-Korea orphans, saying * * * "It is only just and right that educational benefits be provided for children who find themselves fatherless because their parents were under legal compulsion to serve in our Armed Forces."

Other hearings will be conducted shortly after Congress' Easter recess. At that time the Senator plans to call to the rostrum other educators and officials of the Veterans' Administration, Defense Department, Budget Bureau, and the various veterans' organizations.

YARBOROUGH said he is hopeful that a readjustment bill for post-Korea veterans can be enacted by Congress at a very early date, so that eligible ex-GI's can resume their educational careers at the beginning of the next school semester.

The principal feature of YARBOROUGH's proposal to extend the GI bill is the provision which will continue the educational portions of the Korea measure. The cutoff date for the Korea bill was January 31, 1955. The Yarborough measure would extend the rights through July 1, 1963.

The bill provides 1½ days of schooling for each day of active service for veterans who served honorably 90 days or more.

The bill also provides vocational rehabilitation for disabled veterans, and extends eligibility for home and farm loan guarantees.

In addition, the proposed measure would authorize mustering out pay of $100 per person for domestic or foreign service for veterans honorably discharged after the date of its enactment.

Under the peacetime war orphans' measure, each surviving child would be entitled to educational assistance up to 36 months, or to the equivalent in on-the-job training.

HILL TOLD 4-YEAR COLLEGE COURSE IS ABOUT FINISHED

WASHINGTON.—A Senate veterans affairs subcommittee was told last week that the days of the 4-year college curriculum is about over. Four of the country's leading educators blamed this situation on the rapid missile-age expansions in the various technical and scientific fields.

Dr. Clarence B. Hilberry, president of Wayne State University, told the subcommittee, "it has been a long time since anyone finished engineering school in 4 years." He said that as a matter of fact, it hasn't happened for a long time even though we still call our courses full-year courses.

The Detroit educator said that many 4-year courses are becoming 5-year programs. The latest to join the list is pharmacy. These programs are not changing at just one school but at all the schools across the country, Hilberry said.

Many ex-GIs in school now under the Korea bill are not going to finish their curricula in the 4 years they are given school assistance by Uncle Sam.

"A great many of them are going to have to find the resources somewhere to continue for a 5th, 6th, and 7th year," Hilberry said, "before they have the masters' degrees and the doctorates which are required in their respective fields."

Dr. Malcolm W. Willey, academic vice president at the University of Minnesota, brought out statistics to prove that few students receive the baccalaureate degree in 4 years.

His figures show that nearly 70 percent of the students at Minnesota require more time than the traditional 4 years to obtain their first degree.

Willey said the figure was 71 percent in the school's College of Agriculture, Forestry, and Home Economics; 77 percent in technology; 61 percent in business, and 73 percent in education. He said that in Minnesota's College of Science, Literature, and the Arts, the number was 58 percent.

Willey said these figures indicate that one cannot assume that because a student enters college at 18 he will have completed his degree requirements by 22—the age at which he is likely to be called up under selective service.

He said this point "bulwarks the interruption-of-education argument, which is a valid one."

GI, KOREA BILLS NECESSARY EDUCATORS REPORT TO HILL

Four of the Nation's leading educators told a Senate Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee last week that an extension of the GI bill to cold war ex-GIs was vital to our national security.

They said the War II and Korea bills have more than proved their investment through higher national income and better trained scholars and technicians.

A condensed version of the testimony follows:

"STATEMENT OF ROBERT G. BERNREUTER, DEAN OF ADMISSIONS AND SPECIAL ASSISTANT FOR STUDENT AFFAIRS, THE PENNSYLVANIA STATE UNIVERSITY, UNIVERSITY PARK, PA.

As the admissions officer for the Pennsylvania State University, it is my responsibility to enroll a total of 6,700 new undergraduate students for the fall semester of 1959. In doing so, I will give preference to those students who have served on active duty in the Armed Forces. This policy of giving preference to a veteran is not based, to any significant degree, upon sentimentality. Even though I am myself a veteran of War II and have personal sympathy with the problems confronting the young veteran, I do not give preference to veterans for sentimental reasons. Nor am I giving preference to them because of the nostalgic memories of those professors who remember with pleasure the days immediately following War II when a large proportion of all their students were veterans who enlivened their classes with their alert minds and their pointed questions. They enjoyed teaching such classes.

"The policy of giving preference to veterans is based upon the results of research studies contrasting the accomplishments of veterans with nonveterans.

"A study which we have just completed shows that veterans make better scholastic records than do nonveterans. Last semester at Penn State, the average grade earned by the male nonveteran student was a C. The average grade made by a male veteran student was a C+. The proportion of nonveterans who were dismissed for poor scholarship was twice as large as the proportion of veterans.

Another indication of the extent to which the veterans make better used of their opportunities is shown in the percentage of students who quit before graduating. Among those who were admitted last year as freshmen, more than one-third of the nonveterans quit. Among the veterans, less than one-fourth did not return. Proportionally approximately 1½ times as many nonveterans quit as was true of the veterans.

"Still another reason for preferring veterans has been found through a study of the disciplinary actions the university has had to take involving undergraduate students. Out of 1,587 veterans, only 4 were involved in disciplinary actions. This is approximately 1 out of each 400 veterans. This is a clear demonstration of the reason why the dean of men at our university, who is responsible for the discipline of men students, prefers to have us enroll veterans.

"The dean of men has also provided evidence which shows that veterans more frequently possess the desirable attributes which we seek to develop in our students.

"Each year the male students who reside in our residence halls are evaluated with regard to their personal adjustments, their maturity, the leadership qualities that they show, the seriousness of their attitudes toward their studies, and their ability to get along with other students.

"The veterans consistently receive higher ratings in these desirable attributes than do the students who have not had military experience.

"Each year the dean of men chooses a group of male students to act as residence hall counselors. In choosing such counselors from among those students who apply in large numbers each year he chooses those who show the greatest degree of maturity and seriousness of purpose and the ability to assume responsibility. He has not consciously given preference to men with military experience.

"Nevertheless, when he made a tally, at my request, he found that of the 36 students now employed as counselors 32 of them are veterans.

"Only four nonveterans were able to meet the standards set by his office for the position of residence hall counselor.

"It is now clear that veterans have shown themselves to be better students than nonveterans through their more serious application to their studies, through their earning of higher grades, through their smaller dropout rates, through their better discipline, through their better citizenship, and through their increased ability to assume responsibility.

"STATEMENT OF CLARENCE B. HILBERRY, PRESIDENT OF WAYNE STATE UNIVERSITY AND CHAIRMAN OF THE MICHIGAN COUNCIL OF STATE COLLEGE PRESIDENTS

"I would like to make several comments about the value of the bills now before you. First, the educational benefits are particularly valuable, since they permit a wide range of choice by the individual veteran among the various educational opportunities that are most likely to be of value to him.

"These opportunities range from advanced professional and scholarly study to on-the-job training in applied skills.

"Secondly—and I want to stress this point—the proposed legislation, in the judgment of nearly all of us in higher education wisely provides for the payment of benefits directly to the individual veteran.

"The veteran then attends the school or college of his choice. Since our experience across the country appears to be so uniformly favorable, I want to endorse strongly the provisions of the legislation for direct payment to the veteran.

"A third point. The educational allowances proposed in these bills do not grant the same degree of economic assistance to today's veterans as these same dollar amounts did for the Korean veteran.

"Living costs have increased since 1952 and therefore dormitory charges, rental for housing, and expenses for board, tuition, supplies and equipment have also increased in cost to the student. As a result, the sum that a veteran will receive under this bill will support a smaller portion of his educational costs than it did 7 years ago. These increases in costs are clear in our own recent experience at Wayne State University.

"A number of justifiable requests for loans have been made by students attending the university under Public Law 550. Such requests were apparently unnecessary only a few years ago.

"In conclusion, I would like to say that in our experience in public higher education in Michigan we have found that the educational benefits provided veterans have made possible educational opportunities for a large number of very able young men who otherwise would not have beeen able to attend a college or university.

"The bills before you will constitute, I believe, a positive contribution to the total education needs of our Nation. They incorporate the essential principle of direct payment to veterans. The level of allowance though not equal to preceding allowances is substantial. Additional needs of men in this group might perhaps better be met by increasing the loan funds available under the National Defense Education Act.

"STATEMENT OF DR. MALCOLM M. WILLEY, ACADEMIC VICE PRESIDENT, UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"My experience convinces me that the earlier GI bills did contribute fundamentally to national welfare, for there is no doubt that they made it possible for, and encouraged, larger numbers of men to obtain college training.

"The students thus stimulated to seek training and enabled to complete it, our University of Minnesota figures show, have fallen heavily in agriculture, in education, in business, and in technology—as well as in the specialities of the liberal arts college.

"No one can question the importance of doing everything we can to further the training of specialized personnel. For several years I served as a member of General Hershey's Selective Service Advisory Committee on Specialized Personnel, which was basically concerned with the need for more manpower.

"I also served as a member of the Commission on Human Resources and Advanced Training which made one of the most comprehensive studies yet undertaken on our country's human resources and their utilization.

"The so-called GI bills have made an immeasurable contrrbution in meeting the needs these two reports so sharply outlined.

"One cannot say that all of these students would have failed to go on to college training had there been no veterans legislation. But we can testify that a large percentage of these students are drawn from the economically less advantaged families of Minnesota, and we can assume that an appreciable number of them would not have had the resources to enter upon or complete a college education.

"We do know that a higher percentage of these students have gone further with their education and have finished it, than otherwise would be true.

"I might add, too, that the cost of going to college is rising like everything else. At Minnesota we are confronting further tuition raises. Each such increase makes it more difficult, to the point of impossibility, for some young men and women to enter or stay in college.

"The figures I quoted earlier on loan experience indicate that this is so. For one group at least, the GI assistance has served to offset in some measure these problems the students face with rising costs.

"We also know that any break in the educational career of a student, whether for health, financial, or military reasons, reduces definitely the chances that the student will complete his college work. For this reason the break associated with military service can well be the factor that results in failure to complete an education.

"It is my experience, based on contact with students, that the GI privileges have been a compensating factor that has induced students to return to college, following interruption.

"With respect to this matter of interruption, it is sometimes argued that students who graduate from high school at 18 can essentially complete their college education before military service since selective service calls do not come on the average until age 22.

"This might be true if all students did, in fact, enter college at 18 and continued without interruption to the baccalaureate degree, Our experience at Minnesota, where we have studied this question, shows that students in large numbers do not receive the baccalaureate degree in a nominal 4 years.

"Indeed, specific data reveal that in our college of agriculture, forestry, and home economics more than 71 percent of the students take more than the customary 4 years to the baccalaureate degree; in technology more than 77 percent; in business more than 61 percent; and in education 73 percent. In our college of science, literature, and the arts the figure is over 58 percent; and for the university as a whole, 69 percent of the recipients of the first degree take more than the normal, traditional time in school. Another observation can be made bearing on the age-range of our undergraduate students.

"The average age of a Minnesota freshman at matriculation is approximatley 18 and only 33 percent of the freshmen complete requirements for a degree within 4 years after starting, or by the age of 22. Many reasons account for this, including the introduction of 5-year curricula which are increasing, as well as general enrichment of the individual's curriculum.

"I cite these figures to indicate that one cannot assume that because a student enters college at 18 he will have completed his requirements by 22, the age at which he is likely to be called up under selective service. This point bulwarks the interruption of education argument, which is a valid one.

"STATEMENT OF DR. PRICE ASHTON, PRESIDENT OF RANGER JUNIOR COLLEGE, RANGER, TEX.

"I would like to speak and say at this time that the educational institutions in our State are highly in favor of the extension of benefits to veterans of the cold-war category.

"My experience with veterans under Public Laws 346 and 550 has been very gratifying.

"In the Association of Texas Colleges and the Southern Association many surveys have been made, and we have found that the veterans of War II and Korea have all tended to increase the level of education rather than to diminish it.

"At the same time we have encountered many problems with veterans simply because they are more mature.

"For that reason, we feel that we should provide benefits to the peacetime veteran because his problems are as great as a veteran of the Korean war in finishing his education. Oftentimes they have families, even dependents, and the requirements are as great or greater than they have been in the last 6 or 7 years. Expenses are higher.

"The colleges and universities in our State can take care of the veterans and do it adequately.

"We would like to see sufficient money provided by this Congress to make it a positive solution to the problem of the veteran to attend university or college.

"We have had various programs at our college in particular to try to take care of some of the financial difficulties that arise from a veteran coming out and not having adequate money to attend the college or university of his choice.

"I think generally the families of these veterans are particularly interested in having something to offer the veteran when he comes out of the service.

"Even though he serves stateside, or on foreign duty they realize that he (veteran) has a period of readjustment that will be difficult for him when he comes out into civilian life. For that reason they are particularly concerned with this legislation, and many of them express themselves along those lines.

"They feel as if it is one of the greatest pieces of legislation that has been offered in many years.

"I know in California—and I talked to many educators out there—that they have had like experiences on the quality and standard of grades and the improvement of the general attitude, disciplinary conditions of our colleges and universities through these veterans.

"I would like here to congratulate the veterans of the Korea and World War II conflicts, those who have participated in the program, because they have been a group to congratulate, and it has been very gratifying."

OUTDO NONVETERANS SCHOLASTICALLY—VETS DO WELL IN COLLEGE, SURVEY SHOWS

WASHINGTON.—Ex-GI's fare better scholastically in college than nonveterans, a recently completed survey at Pennsylvania State University revealed. Dr. Robert G. Bernreuter, dean of admission for Penn State, told a Senate Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee last week that nonveterans averaged "C" last semester at State while the average for male veterans was "C-plus." He was one of four educators that testified in favor of extending GI bill benefits to cold war ex-GI's.

He said the proportion of nonveterans "who were dismissed for poor scholarship was twice as large as the proportion of veterans."

Bernreuter said the study also revealed that less veterans quit before graduating than nonveterans. He said that more than one-third of the nonveterans who enrolled as freshmen last year did not return this semester. Among the veterans, less than one-fourth did not return.

Another part of the survey shows that ex-GI's get into less trouble than nonveterans. Out of 1,587 veterans at Penn State last semester only 4 were involved in disciplinary actions. This is approximately 1 out of each 400 veterans. The nonveteran ratio is 1 out of 84.

The Penn State educator said this comparison "is a clear demonstration of the reason why the dean of men at our university, who is responsible for the discipline of men students, prefers to have us enroll students."

He said that the dean of men "has also provided evidence which shows that veterans more frequently possess the desirable attributes which we seek to develop in our students."

Each year the University chooses a group of male students to act as residence hall counselors. It chooses those who show the greatest degree of maturity and seriousness of purpose, and the ability to assume responsibility, Bernreuter said.

He pointed out that the dean while "not consciously" giving preference to men with military service found that of the 36 students now employed as counselors, 32 of them are veterans.

"It is now clear," Bernreuter added, "that veterans have shown themselves to be better students than nonveterans through their more serious application to their studies, through their earning of higher grades, through their smaller dropout rates, through their better discipline, through their better citizenship and through their increased ability to assume responsibility."

Penn State's preference for veteran students is based upon the results of research studies, not sentiment. Bernreuter said many professors have "nostalgic memories" of the days immediately following War II when a large proportion of all their students were veterans who enlivened their classes with their alert minds and their pointed questions.

The professors enjoyed teaching such classes and the Penn State survey bears that out.

SENATOR SPARKMAN BACKS GI BILL

The following message is typical of the interest legislators are showing in the cold war GI bill. It was broadcast over 12 Alabama radio stations by Senator JOHN S. SPARKMAN, of Alabama, last weekend:

"This is your Senator, JOHN SPARKMAN. Today I want to talk with you about legislation of interest to Alabama's 348,000 veterans of World War II and the Korean war, as well as those veterans who have served since those wars.

"Of special interest to these veterans who have served since that time is the fact that the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is beginning hearings on legislation that I am sponsoring which would extend the benefits of the GI bill to these veterans. More than 20,000 Alabama veterans would benefit immediately under my bill, with the total reaching 90,000 by 1965.

"I am sponsoring this bill because it would be an incentive for young men to volunteer for service in the Armed Forces and because it is only fair to provide veterans serving now some of the benefits for their service to their country and for the loss of time from civilian pursuits.

"I have no hesitancy about supporting an extension of this bill—and that's what it is. The program is in effect now for all veterans who entered service after January 31, 1955. What it has done for the War II and Korea soldiers it can well do for our soldiers who have entered service since that date.

"This GI bill is in no sense a gift to its recipients. It is a well-earned reward for a well-done job. I feel that the program should continue as long as we continue to draft the youth of our Nation away from their normal civilian pursuits.

"A total of 7.8 million War II veterans took on-the-job training. Education under the GI bill went to many men and women who otherwise could not have afforded it. This education produced 440,000 engineers; 238,000 teachers; 168,000 doctors and dentists; 112,000 scientists; 105,000 lawyers, and 93,000 social scientists and economists.

"Think what a stockpile of needed professional and technical people this program has afforded for these times when we need them so badly. Nearly 230,000 Alabamians were educated and trained following War II and the Korean war.

"The Veterans' Administration expects that by 1970 veterans will have paid back, through the medium of extra income taxes, the cost of the education that was borne by the Government.

"Another bill that I am sponsoring would give veterans of War II and the Korean war who have lost their national service life insurance a chance to reinstate it.

"Veterans would be given a 1-year period in which to file. The cost of this program to the taxpayer would be nothing. All administrative costs would be borne by the policyholder. This bill is pending before the Senate Finance Committee. A similar measure passed the Senate last year as an amendment to another bill, but was omitted by the Senate-House conference committee.

"When War II and Korea war veterans were separated from service they had the option either to keep or to cancel their national service life insurance. Many chose to cancel because of financial difficulties, or simply because it was easy to do so. I remember my own experience from War I. The pay for the premium on my insurance was simply taken out of my check each month. Well, when I was discharged, naturally I just didn't continue to pay. I had the opportunity to renew it under an act passed by Congress some years after that. I renewed it and I'm carrying it today. I believe the veteran of our War II and Korean war ought to be given the same opportunity.

"I wish I could talk to you about other legislation I am sponsoring but I must sign off."

Jefferson-Jackson Day Address by Hon. Frank E. Moss, of Utah

OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 22, 1959

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on March 31 our able and distinguished colleague from Utah [Mr. Moss] addressed the Jefferson-Jackson Day banquet at Conrad, Mont.

I ask unanimous consent that his address on that occasion be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR FRANK E. MOSS, DEMOCRAT, UTAH, BEFORE THE JEFFERSON-JACKSON DAY BANQUET AT CONRAD, MONT.

Certainly it is a real distinction to be invited to address a group of dedicated Democrats on the day they honor such party stalwarts as Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson. And I am fully aware that in Conrad, Mont., I am among very good Democrats indeed—members of the party who are effective as well as loyal—who give foot service as well as lip service. Pondereille County (Ponderay) is famous for the size of its Democratic turnouts at party functions, like Jefferson-Jackson dinners, and at the polls.

I am happy to see and great you all and to visit again with those you have chosen to lead you in party affairs. In mentioning some, I realize that many more remain unmentioned; and that, in this type of activity, it is the work of every individual and the carrying of every district that makes it possible to keep the party going and gives people like me the opportunity of serving my State in Washington.

You all realize, I am sure, the pleasure it gives me to see again, even for a short time, the grandeur of the mountains and plains, the lakes and waterfalls, of the West. And to visit in Montana, a state that is linked to my own bonds of friendship and mutual interest, and also with a common pioneering tradition, and by many of your people being descendants of early Utah Mormon pioneer families.

I appreciate the confidence of Congressman ANDERSON in inviting a freshman Senator to address the big celebration in his home town. And I learned coming in tonight that the Congressman is one of those somewhat unusual men who can carry his home town in an election. I am told that ROY ANDERSON has always been a leader, and I believe it, because I can tell you that he has certainly shown that leadership in Washington in every way—from being an officer in the Thursday Morning Prayer Breakfast Group to outstanding work for the Hawaii statehood bill in the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. As a major general in the Army Reserve, Congressman ANDERSON is the highest ranking Reserve officer in the Congress. As every one in my audience knows, he commands the 96th Infantry Division, of which there are many units in Utah; and we have many mutual friends in that organization. Fortunately, he has been assigned to the Armed Services Committee, where his experience can be used to best advantage in helping to guide our defense program during these critical times. On the Interior Committee, Congressman ANDERSON has rendered yeoman service in Indian matters. Our Indian brethren appreciate his sympathetic and constructive interest in their problems.

For a new Senator, Washington has many surprises, most of them pleasant. My biggest surprise, however—and I think I can claim an exclusive on this one—was to be asked to address Lincoln Day as well as Jefferson-Jackson dinners. One of the first pieces of mail I opened was from Republican National Chairman Mead Alcorn, requesting my preferences as to places to deliver Lincoln Day speeches.

And actually, I should like the opportunity of talking to a Republican Lincoln Day audience. They might not like what they heard, but I could tell them some things they don't hear often enough and that they ought to know. For one thing, I could quote them words of Lincoln that the Republicans don't use very often. For example, Lincoln said: "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present * * * as our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew." How many Republican Lincoln Day speakers quoted that this year? Or were they talking about the balanced budget and that alone? Our revered Civil War President also said: "There are already among us those who, if the Union be preserved, will live to see it contain 250 millions of population. The struggle of today is not altogether for today; it is for a vast future also." Lincoln thought and planned not only for the present but for the great future which he saw for America.

And it is no accident that those we honor today predate Lincoln by many years; and no accident that our party is so much older than the Republican Party. For, if there is any organization or institution, it is just this ability to think anew and act anew when conditions require it.

I object to conservatives wrapping themselves in the mantle of Jefferson as much as I do the mantle of Lincoln. The conservatives of Jefferson's day were not those one thing that is necessary to the survival of who signed the Declaration of Independence or helped construct and obtain ratification of the Constitution.

Let the standpatters read this, inscribed on a panel of the Memorial Room of the Jefferson Memorial. I quote: "I am not an advocate for frequent changes in laws and constitutions. But laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths discovered and manners and opinions change; with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also to keep pace with the times."

What conservative standpat Republican of that day or this day would have had the courage and vision to obtain the Louisiana Purchase and secure to America in her infancy the great State of Montana and all of her sister States down river to the gulf?

Jefferson was a man of action and courage; but, above all, a man of vision. Because of these, I am happy to count myself a Jeffersonian Democrat and to point to the distinguished Senators from Montana as worthy successors to the Jeffersonian tradition.

As the experienced and respected chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, JAMES E. MURRAY, stands today as the most powerful individual in America influencing the development of water resources. I am most grateful for the opportunity of serving with him on the committee. I also wish to acknowledge his personal friendship and encouragement. Before the session, when I visited Washington to make plans for the beginning, it was Senator MURRAY who made my task much easier by making available the use of his office and facilities.

And we are all aware of the outstanding contribution to the leadership of the U.S. Senate made by MIKE MANSFIELD, and of the meaning to the West of that leadership. Senator MANSFIELD is the Democratic Party whip, or assistant leader. He is a leader on the Foreign Affairs Committee. I point out further that the policy of MANSFIELD, that all Senators must have membership on important committees, has greatly benefited our section; and, at the same time increased the contribution that new Members can make to the work of the Senate. So successful has been this policy in fact, that public approval, plus the nudge given by the electorate last fall, has forced the Republican leadership to adopt a similar one.

And wouldn't the growing political power of the West have delighted Andrew Jackson. Old Hickory was the first western President, coming from what was to easterners the frontier—Tennessee. And however different the backgrounds of Jefferson, the Virginia intellectual, and Jackson, the Tennessee warrior, may have been, their basic political philosophy was in agreement on one most important point—that the Government of this Republic belonged to all the people.

The Western Conference of Democratic Senators now includes the States of Alaska, Oklahoma, and Texas, and shortly Hawaii. We include 23 of the 28 Senators from the West; and when Hawaii's 2 Democratic Senators are elected, we shall be 25 of 30 Senators. Not only do we have numbers, but we have leadership as well.

Speaking of the election, one of the most interesting features to me is the reaction of the Republicans to their defeat.

To go back just a few years, about the time General Eisenhower emerged as the man who might restore the Republican presidential dynasty, professional advertising and public relations men were brought into political campaigns as never before. Often to their surprise, these gentlemen were presented as able to put vote getting on a scientific basis.

If they could sell soap or automobiles, it was said, why not candidates? And why not? What was forgotten is that the same brand of soap or the same make of car is not always the most popular; or, to put it another way, advertising men, like the rest of us, have their failures as well as their successes.

But the Eisenhower campaigns were certainly successful, and the Republican leadership had their big contributors, the rank and file, and themselves, sold on the fact that this was the answer.

So their reaction to the defeat of 1958 is that something went wrong with the sales talk. What they need, the newspapers report, is a new image. Not new candidates. Not a new program. Above all, not new ideas. Just a new image—a new front to present to the voters.

While the Republicans are searching for their new image—something that will make Senator GOLDWATER and Governor Rockefeller look good together—we Democrats have more serious business to attend to. It is up to us to supply the deficiencies in Republican thinking, in Republican programs, and, as far as Congress can, in Republican leadership. We promised the voters action. Let's see how we are producing on that promise.

The Easter recess is the close of the first phase of a session of Congress. Newspaper commentators in Washington are saying that no Congress has done more in this short time than has this one.

Normally, at this stage, no major bills have been acted on; legislation is in the drafting stage or in committee. But we went to the country last fall with a program, and we are enacting it. Here are some of the things the Senate has done:

We have passed a housing bill to bring closer our goal of a decent home for every American.

We have passed airport legislation to prepare America for the jet age in transportation.

We have started a nationwide program to put depressed areas back on their feet.

We have added another great Western State—Hawaii—to the Union.

We have moved ahead in clearing the Nation's slum areas and helping urban renewal.

And, as always, we have stood with the administration on vital matters of foreign policy, even while disagreeing with the White House on many points of national defense.

Much remains to be done, and we are working on many other problems.

The Montana delegation is leading the fight to develop a farm program that will insure the prosperous continuance of the family size farm and provide the farmer with a fair share of the national income. And one which, if properly administered, will eventually cost the taxpayer less money. I am disturbed at the growing resentment of consumer groups at the cost and ineffectiveness of our present program. This cost is being used to separate the farmer and the farm program from necessary labor support.

Another vital program is that of education. The administration continues to do everything possible to put this on an "every locality for itself" basis, even advocating eliminating Federal contributions to areas having unusual educational demands due to Federal projects.

I am happy to be supporting Senator MURRAY and your distinguished First District Congressman, LEE METCALF, as a cosponsor of their bill to provide some degree of equalization of education on a national basis. While the control and administration of education may be a local function, the quality of education, in times like these, is very much a matter of national concern. We cannot maintain our military position or our economic position without an adequate program. And equalization of opportunity is a vital part of such a program.

Both Utah and Montana have State equalization programs. We have long recognized the folly of allowing educational opportunity to depend on the amount of taxable property that happens to fall in a particular school district. Both Utah and Montana educate large numbers of children who leave the States as soon as they are through with school and ready to become taxpayers. And our equalization programs have not meant centralized State control. What we have done in our States we can—and should—do in the Nation.

But of major importance to the West, I think, and of vital importance to the Nation, is the matter of the preservation and development of our natural resources, and of our most important resource—water.

Certainly it is not necessary for me to convince a Montana audience that we need to conserve our water and other resources. But we still have a big job to do in this field—let's make no mistake about that. And we westerners must continue to take the lead in showing why it is in the interest of all America to develop these resources. And as Democrats we must make the Nation see that we are going to get full development only with a Democrat in the White House.

It is true that we are beginning to recognize that water conservation is a national, not a local, problem. As our water table falls, our demand increases. Today we are using about 240 billion gallons a day. By 1975, if our 175 million population grows to 225 million as expected, even our present rate of consumption would strain our resources. But our rising standard of living requires much more water per capita both for personal and home use and for industrial expansion. It is expected that by 1975 we will need 350 billion gallons a day, or more than a 90 percent increase over the amount used in 1950.

Preservation of water resources is one of the principal items claiming the attention of the Congress, and the Western Conference of Democratic Senators is actively working on a commission to survey the Nation's needs. Already, we look upon resource development as an investment—not as an expense. We must make all our people see the problem in these terms.

One change that might help and an idea that is getting some attention in Washington these days, is a more businesslike accounting system for the Government. The plan is to separate, as businesses do, items that represent capital investments and self-liquidating projects from expenditures for regular expense items. It might be that defense items could be placed in still a third category. This would make discussion of budget items more specific and enable us to comprehend this complicated subject more clearly. It is hoped that it would promote greater public understanding and interest in the Government's fiscal affairs.

One of the problems of Utah and the Upper Colorado River Basin States is to assure adequate appropriations to push ahead on the great upper Colorado River project. A whole speech could easily be devoted to the history, the features, and the benefits of the upper Colorado storage project that is now under way. It is an example of the work that is necessary and the time that often must be expended to get these projects going.

For more than 50 years this project has been in mind. Some land withdrawals were made as early as 1904.

The project, when completed, will develop an area of 100,000 square miles. It will consist of four large mainstream dams, one on the Green River on the Utah-Wyoming border, one on the Colorado on the Arizona-Utah border, one on the San Juan in New Mexico, and one on the Gunnison River in Colorado.

It provides a true basinwide approach to the development of the water and power resources. A basin fund is created as a master account in the U.S. Treasury. This account will receive all funds appropriated by Congress for the project and all revenue collected from irrigation, power, and municipal water sales, or other sources.

After payment of interest, operation, and maintenance costs, the revenues will be allocated on a percentage basis to the four States and will be used for participating projects in the State.

The project will add 1 million kilowatts to upper basin power capacity; 132,360 acres of new land will come under irrigation, and 234,000 acres will receive supplemental water.

One of the most interesting aspects of one of the projects, not yet started, is that it will provide a means of raising the standard of living of America's largest Indian tribe—the Navahos. The Navajo Dam, in Arizona, will provide water largely for the use of these people, who need rehabilitation so much.

More than 200 different minerals are found in the Colorado Basin area, and the project will provide the water and power necessary for their full and economic development.

The great Glen Canyon and Flaming Gorge Dams now under construction will allow the upper basin States to store sufficient water so that the commitment to the lower basin States will be in storage and will allow much water now going down the Colorado into the Gulf of Mexico to be diverted to irrigation.

This is a self-sufficient project. Every cent the Treasury pays out will be returned with interest. It is an investment in America's future.

Great recreation areas will be opened up, not only for scenic boating, fishing, etc., but the area will develop greatly in such items as bird refuges, for ducks and other migratory birds.

Our problems are your problems—because all America is one, indissoluble—in building upper Colorado and thus building our country; just as your problems are our problems—in building your great Missouri Basin and northwest projects.

The Yellowtail Dam on the Bighorn River, Missouri River Basin project was authorized in 1944; the right-of-way problem on Indian lands was settled in the last session of Congress. But the project cannot be begun until it is put in the budget. But the administration has not submitted a budget request because of its "no new starts" policy. That great dam would have storage capacity of 1,080,000 acre feet, powerplant capacity of 200,000 kilowatts, and annual generation of 597 million kilowatts per hour. Both Montana and Wyoming would benefit and grow, and so would America. This would be an investment in the future of America.

What I have said about Yellowtail applies to Clark Canyon Dam, the east branch unit of the Missouri Basin project, and the Beaverhead River in the southwestern part of your great State. There is no money in the President's budget for these needed projects, and the administration's policy of "no new starts" would doom them. However, you can count on your Democratic Congressmen and Senators to fight for these western development projects.

But theirs is a greater reason than recreation or economic benefit and comforts to our people for the development of our natural resources. That reason is national survival.

During a hundred and fifty years of our history, our isolated position behind the oceans made us invulnerable to powerful surprise attack. And our great productive machine made it possible for us to get ready, with ample time, after an attack. Today we are minutes away from Moscow via missiles. In our life time this profound change has occurred, the details of which we are all too painfully familiar. We are aware that the Soviet Union increased its territory and expanded its world influence since World War II, but even more ominous for the future is the fact that the backward nations are beginning to use the productive methods developed by the West; and, as they do, their enormously greater populations are beginning to tell against us. We must be ready in armament, and we must grow industrially and economically.

The men in the Kremlin know what kind of world they want it to be 20 years from now. They boldly plan for that world and channel their resources, their educational facilities, and their diplomatic maneuvers to making it that kind of world.

If we are to win in this kind of struggle, we must decide what kind of world we want it to be 20 years from now. And within the framework of democratic individual liberty, make the necessary effort to create that kind of world.

In Washington today we hear the refrain: "How much does it cost?" "Can we afford to keep ahead?" Let us remind ourselves that those, like Jefferson, who signed the Declaration of Independence, did not count the cost. They had lived under tyranny. They wanted freedom.

Now maybe I have analyzed our situation all wrong, but I don't think so. But if I am right in thinking that we must have farsightedness, courage, decisiveness, leadership in the period ahead, I believe that is calling for a Democrat in the White House. Our party has provided vision and decision in times of crisis before. With the challenge that lies ahead, I am proud that our party can put forward so many men of capacity, experience, and vigor as candidates for the Presidency.

Unlike the opposition, which is restricted to one rather tarnished heir apparent and one glittering but politically untried challenger, we can offer veterans of the political wars from every section of the Nation. Our party has, in short, what the Nation needs and the opposition lacks—leadership.

Let us raise our eyes to America's horizons of tomorrow. Let us look ahead not only 1 year or 10 years, but 50 years and 100 years. Let us build an America and a world in which free men live and prosper. Let us seize the opportunities for leadership which are ours.

These are the tenets and the vision of Jefferson and Jackson; the tenets and vision of the Democratic Party today.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—ORDER TO CONVENE AT 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I announce that there is a treaty on the Executive Calendar, and we expect to have the Senate take a yea-and-nay vote on the question of ratifying it. We shall give the Senate due notice prior to that time.

We also expect to have the calendar called at an early date; and I should like to have the aides on both sides of the aisle inform the review committees or calendar committees, so they will be prepared.

We expect to follow the pending labor bill with the supplemental appropriation bill.

Hearings have been completed on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

In addition, we expect to bring up by motion, at an early date, the railroad retirement bill.

I anticipate that unless action on the pending labor bill is concluded soon, we shall have evening sessions for the remainder of the week, lasting until late in the evening, possibly as late as 11 or 11:30 o'clock.

We hope to have the sessions convene at 10 a.m. for the remainder of the week.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the session today, the Senate adjourn until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to have all Members of the Senate know that in the event the Senate has not concluded its action on the labor bill by Saturday, we expect to have a Saturday session. I hope all Senators will adjust their calendars accordingly.

This week it has been necessary to end the daily sessions at relatively early hours, because of engagements which certain Senators had made. I hope that if any of them have made engagements for the remainder of the week or for next week, about which we do not know, and which involve a number of Senators, they will inform the leadership, so we may attempt to plan to suit their convenience.

This afternoon the International Chamber of Commerce will be addressed by the President of the United States, and a panel of distinguished Senators will appear before the meeting. I have discussed with the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, what plans we should work out in an attempt to accommodate our colleagues and to show respect to the President and to suit the requests of the International Chamber of Commerce. Therefore, we have agreed that today, between the hours of 2:45 and 4:15 p.m., no yea-and-nay votes will be taken. In other words, from a quarter of 3 until a quarter past 4, no roll call vote will be had; at that time there will be an hour and a half during which no yea-and-nay votes will be taken.

Otherwise, we expect and we anticipate yea-and-nay votes at any time until 11 o'clock this evening.

RESOLUTION OF 1959 CURED CANCER CONGRESS OF AMERICAN CANCER SOCIETY

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am sure many Members of the Senate will recall that on April 1st last year we had the privilege and pleasure of welcoming to the Senate a group of men, women and children who are living testimony of the great progress that has been made in the control of cancer during the past decade. These good people from all parts of the United States visited the Senate as the first Cured Cancer Congress of the American Cancer Society. It was an inspiring and thrilling experience for us.

The second annual Cured Cancer Congress was held in Washington on March 30th and 31st of this year, while Congress was in Easter recess.

I am honored to have been presented the following resolution adopted by the 1959 Cured Cancer Congress by Joseph E. Cook, chairman of the Congress, and am happy to present the resolution to the Senate at this time. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be embodied in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas more than 800,000 men, women, and children in the United States have now been cured of cancer; and

Whereas 75,000 Americans died needlessly during those same 12 months despite the fact that the medical knowledge to save them did and does exist; and another 75,000 Americans will die needlessly in the next 12 months unless they receive early and adequate treatment; and

Whereas more than 40 million of our fellow citizens will eventually develop cancer, unless the disease is quickly curbed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Cured Cancer Congress of the American Cancer Society duly assembled in its second annual session, express appreciation of the life-saving research achievements of the National Cancer Institute and urge the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States to approve an appropriation of at least $85 million for the National Cancer Institute to enable it to continue and expand its vastly important research activities, in the fiscal year starting June 30, 1959; and further

Resolved, That the Cured Cancer Congress endorse the Health for Peace Act to create a National Institute of International Medical Research with funds to encourage and support research and the exchange of information on research, the training of research personnel, and the improvement of research facilities throughout the world; and further

Resolved, That each and every Member of the U.S. Congress be urged to see that he and his family have a complete annual checkup for cancer, and that each Member give full support to the American Cancer Society's 1959 cancer crusade in the State he represents to the end that no life shall be lost needlessly to cancer in the coming year; and further Resolved, That a delegate to this congress deliver this resolution to Senator LISTER HILL for presentation to the Senate.

RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF DUTCHESS COUNTY, N.Y.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of Dutchess County, N.Y., relating to the proposed reduction of beds at the Castle Point Veterans' Hospital, in the State of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 71, OF BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF DUTCHESS COUNTY, N.Y., RE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Whereas the Veterans' Administration has maintained a hospital at Castle Point, N.Y., for the care of tubercular veterans for the past 35 years; and

Whereas through improvement in tuberculosis treatment, the caseload of patients has in the past and is presently diminishing, with the result that the 512 bed Castle Point Veterans' Hospital is now utilizing only 270 beds; 230 for tubercular patients and 40 for general medical and surgical patients; and

Whereas the Veterans' Administration as of July 1, 1959 contemplates reducing the number of available beds by an additional 40; 30 for TB patients and 10 for general medical and surgical patients; and

Whereas the Veterans' Administration is contemplating a further reduction of beds as of July, 1960; and

Whereas veterans from the Mid-Hudson area must now be hospitalized in VA facilities in Albany and New York, where admittance waiting lists generally prevail, rather than at a VA hospital closer to home; and

Whereas the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has the authority to allocate and relocate the 125,000 beds for veterans in VA facilities, and

Whereas there is a constant demand for hospitalization of veterans from the Mid-Hudson area for general medical and surgical care: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Board of Supervisors of Dutchess County go on record as urging the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and such other Government officials as are deemed necessary, to allocate at least 75 to 100 beds for veteran patients needing general medical and surgical treatment at the Castle Point facility thereby eliminating the needless delay in securing admittance in the Albany or New York VA hospitals and providing immediate hospital treatment for eligible veterans needing such hospital care. And the clerk of the board of supervisors is hereby instructed to forward certified copies of this resolution to the following named officials:

1. William S. Middleton, M.D., Chief Medical Director, Department of Medicine and Surgery, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D.C.

REBATE OF PORTION OF INCOME TAXES COLLECTED FROM EACH STATE

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I am about to introduce a bill, and I ask unanimous consent that I may speak on it in excess of the 3 minutes allowed under the order which has been entered.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

FEDERAL INCOME TAX REBATE WOULD HELP THE STATES FINANCE FAIRLY AND EFFECTIVELY EXPANDED SERVICES

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, many of the States of our Nation confront a grave and growing financial crisis. I now introduce for appropriate reference a bill which is designed to aid the States in meeting this situation. My bill provides for an annual rebate by the Federal Government to each State in an amount equal to 5 percent of the individual income taxes collected within that State.

My bill recognizes:

First. The requirement of the States for additional revenue to support expansion of existing services and creation of new programs to meet current and projected need.

Second. The special political and legal difficulties which face State officials seeking to obtain revenues adequate to sustain the optimum level of expenditures.

Third. The ability of the Federal Government to tax more effectively and more equitably than the individual State governments.

Fourth. The desirability of providing the States with a Federal grant which offers certainty of revenue and insures autonomy in expenditure.

STATES FACE FINANCIAL CRISIS

Mr. President, newspaper and periodical columns remind us daily of the extent and magnitude of the financial problem of the States. A recent news story in a daily newspaper in my State effectively summarizes the plight of the States. I ask unanimous consent that an article headlined "States Swim in Red Ink," which appeared in the March 30, 1959, issue of the Oregonian of Portland, Oreg., appear at this point in my remarks, together with a table prepared for me by the Library of Congress showing the relationship between the relative wealth of the people of the individual States and the burden of taxes collected for maintenance of the State and local government.

There being no objection, the article and the table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregonian, Mar. 30, 1958]

STATES SWIM IN RED INK—EXPLODING GROWTH BLAMED FOR DEFICITS

(By Nicholas Shuman)

CHICAGO.—The 49 States—like Big Daddy in Washington—are up to their elbows in rising bills. At least 10 of them, as a matter of fact, are over their heads.

According to the Federation of Tax Administrators, red ink this year is pouring over:

Michigan, $111 million; Pennsylvania, $100 million; California, $68 million; Texas, $65 million; Washington, $46 million.

There are others—including tiny Vermont and Delaware—and most of those that don't have deficits are on the brink.

Total spending by State governments in the current fiscal year stands at $25 billion.

The tax administrators said that State budgets have been climbing at the rate of 10 percent a year since 1953—and they expect about the same in the new fiscal year.

What's behind it? The recession? Welfare statism?

The federation puts most of the blame on America's exploding population—more people needing more State services.

But isn't the taxpaying population also rising?

Yes; but not in the same proportion The big explosion is under age 21 (the people who need schools and teachers) and over age 65 (the people who most often need public welfare assistance).

LOW BIRTH RATE FACTOR

The rise in the population, in between—the breadwinners and taxpayers—is disproportionately low because of the low birth rate during the depression years.

Culprit No. 2, according to the federation, is the inflation, which keeps the cost of things the States buy running ahead of incoming revenues.

Lesser roles are given to new or wider spending and to the recession.

The increase in State services has been fairly minor, according to a spokesman for the tax administrators. And tax revenues for all States rose 2.6 percent even in recession 1958 (although welfare spending rose, too).

State spending is increasing the most, obviously, in the field of education.

HIGHWAYS DRAIN

Next to the schools, highways are taking most funds. One reason for this jump is that States must match $9 in Federal funds with $1 of their own to qualify under the Federal Highway Act of 1956 to build a big interstate road network.

Elsewhere, States are increasing their spending on care for the mentally ill and on wages for their payrollers to keep up with wages in industry.

Of the 43 States where legislatures so far have convened, higher taxes have been called for in at least 28, according to the federation.

NO ROOM FOR NOVELTIES

Where will the money come from? Are the Governors coming up with any novel tax schemes?

No, there isn't any room for novelties. "We're already taxing everything," said a federation spokesman.

More money is being squeezed out of the tried-and-true fields of sales, income, tobacco, gasoline, and vehicle taxes. Where the taxes exist, they are being boosted. Where they don't, they are being enacted.

Thirty States now have taxes on individual incomes and 35 States have corporation income taxes. Illinois has neither.

In a fourth of the States where tax increases are being asked, raises in the levies on gasoline and motor vehicles have been proposed.

In only one State has a tax reduction been suggested. That's Kansas, where Gov. George Docking cut the budget by $7 million and asked for a sales tax reduction from 2½ to 2 percent.

Other States in financial vigor are Indiana ($35 million surplus) and New Jersey ($15,300,000).

What's their magic?

Kansas, Indiana, and New Jersey all adopted major tax increases last year or the year before.

The rest of the Union still has its castor oil on the table.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, what are the major difficulties which face our State governments as they attempt to solve the revenue expenditures dilemma?

Some of these problems are inherent in the nature of the Federal system.

First. Unlike the Federal Government, the taxing jurisdiction of a State government is not synonymous with the economic area which affects it. Industry, transportation facilities, and services do not necessarily respect State boundaries. The result is frequently interstate jurisdictional conflict or failure to realize deserved revenue.

Second. The freedom of State residents to relocate imposes a certain constraint upon State governments. The mobility of persons and firms inhibits use of the taxing power.

Third. State governments cannot operate in isolation. Because of the relative ease with which persons and industries may move from one area to another, one State is vitally affected by the tax program of another. Interstate competition for new residents and new industry is often made, however fallaciously, the key issue in State revenue debates.

Fourth. While implementation of economic stabilization and resource distribution policies are of vital importance to the States, they have little power to handle this responsibility of government by themselves.

THE STATES NOT POLITICAL ENTITY

The States are fragments of the Union. The States are not a political entity to be placed in juxtaposition to the Federal Government. They are 49 separate entities.

The States have no control over the money market; they are only passive participants in the sale of Government securities.

Political barriers frequently prevent continuity of action, even within a single State. Short terms of many elected officials, obsolete constitutional and statutory restrictions on taxing and borrowing powers of State legislatures, brief biennial sessions, failure to reapportion, all operate to hinder effective long-range action.

Fifth. The intertwining of State and local financial questions results in problems of separation of revenue sources and division of functions.

Sixth. The fiscal capacity of individual States bears no direct relationship to need, although there is often a definite inverse correlation.

Other problems which loom large in State government are the result of factors peculiar to this decade.

POPULATION GROWTH ADDS COST

First. An expanding population is rapidly forcing an increasing outlay merely to maintain the status quo in terms of service. For instance, capital construction, curtailed during World War II, has not yet caught up with the need for physical facilities. In 1946, public-school enrollment was 23.3 million; by 1956 the figure was 31 million; and it is predicted that another 13 or 14 million children will be enrolled by 1965. Motor-vehicle registrations were 34 million in 1946; in 1956 they reached 64 million; and an estimated 80 million vehicles will be on the road in 1964.

Second. The taxpaying population increase in many States is not keeping pace with the general population rise. The results of the baby boom and the increase in the proportion of people 65 years of age and older, due to increased longevity, has fostered an enlargement of the class of persons who require services, such as schools and health care, but who do not bear a full taxload.

I ask unanimous consent that a chart illustrating these two facts be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Population of the United States 1946 and 1956

Year	Population	Ages 5 to 17	Age 65 and over
1946 (thousands)	140,054	28,934	10,375
1956 (thousands)	167,259	38,683	14,407
Percent increase 1956 and 1946	19.4	33.7	38.9

Mr. NEUBERGER. Third, Mr. President, rising prices have forced up the cost of providing present State services. The prices of goods and services purchased by State and local governments have risen more than have the prices of other goods and services. I ask unanimous consent that a chart prepared by Tax Foundation, Inc., which indicates this relationship, be included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. NEUBERGER. Fourth, Mr. President, changes in social conditions and public attitudes toward them has caused the creation of new programs designed to meet the new needs.

Fifth. The recession has placed a heavy burden on many States as they seek to care for those most heavily hit by the economic decline, while at the same time the States are suffering a decrease in revenue receipts, due to the loss of earning power by many residents.

Sixth. National revenue requirements have placed a dual Federal-State demand on certain subjects of taxation. Furthermore, matching grants to the States have tended to encourage earmarking by the States, to the detriment of rational allocation of resources.

Mr. President, the bill I introduce today is no panacea. As a former State legislator, I fully recognize that no single program could possibly deal with all the complexities involved in the 12 factors I have cited. In many cases, solutions can be reached only through the machinery of State and local government. In other instances, national needs make mandatory specific programs initiated by the Federal Government.

PROPOSAL PROVIDES EXPENDITURE FREEDOM

Although my bill does not provide a final answer, I believe it would effectively aid in solving some of these problems by making available to the States revenues realized through progressive taxation to be utilized in providing needed public services. A block grant such as I propose offers the advantages of assured revenue availability and guaranteed independence in expenditure. It would free the States, to an important extent, from apprehension that some other, economically competitive neighbor State might attract wealth by means of regressive taxation and skimpy social-service budgets.

Mr. President, in the past 6 years we have heard repeated expressions by the administration of its desire to abandon Federal responsibilities to the States. These statements are always accompanied by exhortations to the States to assume the functions discarded by the Federal Government and the assertion that Federal taxes would be reduced more than States taxes would be raised. When we get down to cases, it is always the Federal programs in the fields of human welfare and social needs which would be abandoned to the States, and rarely those which are of financial importance to business and industry.

PRESIDENT OVERLOOKS VITAL FACTS

The viewpoint which President Eisenhower and members of his administration have so frequently emphasized fails to considers two vital facts:

First. The States, when looked at collectively, in contradistinction to the Federal Government, cannot assume responsibility for social programs to relieve the Federal Government of that responsibility. Each individual State may or may not do so. The alternative to having the Congress enact a program of national significance is, not to have it enacted by some mythical substitute called the States, but to have it enacted by 49 separate State legislatures, each of which is far more vulnerable to the pressures of the special economic interests within itself than is the National Congress.

Second. Even if all States were to agree on identical goals, the fiscal resources and capacity of the several States often make it impossible for them to carry out, uniformly and successfully, functions which may be important to the whole Nation. Within any one State, each proposed increase in the budget for new or improved programs of social progress is certain to be met with the scare cry that business and industry are being driven to other States which subordinate such programs to fiscal conservatism and economy.

STATES NEED NEW REVENUE SOURCE

I submit that an important step in the solution of the financial problems presently confronting our State governments is to give all States a new source of revenue which each may use for any governmental purpose of its choice. Abandonment of Federal revenues along with Federal responsibilities would only be a backward step in meeting this challenge to the States to assume new programs and to meet enlarged demands in connection with existing services.

The Federal Government has a responsibility to adopt particular programs designed to deal with nationwide problems which affect the operation of State and local governments, with their widely varying needs and fiscal capacity. These include programs to implement policies of full employment, maximum economic growth, and price stability.

But if we are to maintain the effectiveness of our State governments, I think that we must simultaneously move in the direction of assisting the States to realize needed general revenue.

Today, there is in existence good precedent which the President and the Congress can study in considering my bill. Other countries with Federal forms of government confront the same conditions which we do, such as the absorption of revenue by growing national needs and the wide disparity among the fiscal resources left to local government.

CANADA SUPPLIES EXAMPLE

Thus, Canada since World War II has had a system of tax rebates from the national government to the governments of the several provinces. Known as tax-rental agreements, the Canadian system offers these tax rebates to individual provinces, in return for their giving up to the national government certain sources of taxation. Australia, which also has a Federal Government, has met the problem similarly.

These systems are different from my proposal, which is simpler. It involves no shift of wealth among the States. I propose no limitation whatever on the freedom of action of the individual States. Each may maintain whatever tax structures it desires. It may use the additional revenue for any public purpose its legislature may wish. My purpose is exclusively to strengthen, not to impair, the role of the States in meeting the needs of modern governments. But the Canadian tax-rebate system might well be studied as a precedent for what can be done with tax transfers to solve the fiscal problems of modern governments of divided sovereignty.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at the end of my remarks the text of my bill, together with a memorandum prepared by Raymond E. Manning, senior specialist in taxation of the Library of Congress, concerning the constitutionality of my proposal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and memorandum will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1776) to authorize an appropriation to each State of an amount equal to 5 percent of the individual income taxes collected in such State during each fiscal year, introduced by Mr. NEUBERGER, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for each fiscal year thereafter, to each State an amount equal to 5 per centum of the individual income taxes (computed as provided in this Act) collected within such State during the preceding fiscal year.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before October 1, 1960, and on or before October 1 of each succeeding year, pay to each State the amount authorized to be appropriated to such State pursuant to the first section of this Act.

(b) Payments to the States under subsection (a) shall be made on the basis of amounts of individual income taxes collected in the various internal revenue districts. The principal revenue officer for each internal revenue district shall report to the Secretary, in such manner and at such times as the Secretary shall prescribe, such information as the Secretary finds necessary to enable him to make payments under subsection (a).

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act, the amount of individual income taxes collected within a State during any fiscal year is an amount equal to—

(a) the total amount of individual income taxes collected in the internal revenue district or districts in such State during such fiscal year, less

(b) the total amount of credits, refunds, and abatements allowed or paid in such internal revenue district or districts with respect to overpayments of individual income taxes during such fiscal year.

SEC. 4. For purposes of this Act—

(a) The term "individual income taxes" means—

(1) the tax on the income of individuals imposed by chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954;

(2) the tax on the income of nonresident alien individuals and certain partnerships imposed by chapter 3 of such Code; and

(3) the tax on the wages of individuals imposed by chapter 24 of such Code.

(b) The term "State" means the various States, the Territories of the United States, and the District of Columbia.

The memorandum presented by Mr. NEUBERGER is as follows:

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., January 2, 1957.

To: Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER.
From: Raymond E. Manning, senior specialist in taxation.
Subject: Sharing of Federal income tax with States.

This is in response to questions 1 and 5 of your memorandum of November 20, re sharing of Federal income-tax collections with the States.

1. Constitutionality of sharing arrangement: Question 1 asked for a statement on the constitutionality of a statute turning over Federal tax revenues to State governments without any limitation on the purposes for which the money may be used and without any Federal control over its spending. The quick answer is that no basis is believed to exist for a successful challenge of any such statute. This position would seem to be doubly sure if: (1) All collections from the income tax continues to be paid into the general fund; and (2) a separate statute makes provision for a periodic payment to each State, the payment to be measured by Federal income-tax collections therein.

PERTINENT CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

There is no pertinent provision in the Constitution which precisely lays down the scope of, or limitations on, the power of Congress to appropriate funds. However, any examination of the appropriating power requires consideration of article 1, section 8, clause 1, and article 1, section 9, clause 7.

The first of these empowers Congress " * * * to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States * * *." The second provides that "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law * * *."

The possible application of the first is developed later; the application of the second can have no pertinency here so long as the money paid to the States is made pursuant to an appropriation enacted by Congress.

STATUTORY PRECEDENTS

Over the years, Congress has by numerous statutes appropriated sums of money to be distributed among the States to be used by them for purposes specified in the enacting statute. None of these statutes has ever been successfully challenged. In fact, the Supreme Court has held that neither an individual nor a State had a sufficient interest to challenge the constitutionality of such a statute, Forthingham v. Mellon, and Massachusetts v. Mellon (262 U.S. 447 (1923)).

In addition to this type of statute Congress has for several years directed that funds equal to revenues from certain taxes shall be made available to the States for designated purposes; e. g., proceeds of excise tax on firearms, shells, and cartridges to be used for wildlife restoration (U.S.C., title 16, sec. 669–669j), and excise tax on fishing rods, creels, etc., for fish restoration and management projects (U.S.C., title 16, sec. 777–777k). And during 1956, the Congress directed the creation of a trust fund of amounts equivalent to collections of gasoline and certain other taxes on motor vehicles, the proceeds to be used for Federal highway aid (act of June 29, 1956, Public 627, sec. 209).

A limited search, however, has developed, no instance of a Federal appropriation for distribution among the States for any purpose the States may determine. Perhaps the most analogous instance was the distribution in 1836 and 1837 of the surplus in the United States Treasury. The authorizing statute, act of June 23, 1836, did not in so many words actually appropriate the money to the States, but in effect this was the result. The act in its own words provided for the deposit of the surplus with the States in proportion to representation in Congress, and contain a provision for its repayment to the Treasury on demand, but the result was the same as an outright gift. Apparently no court case was instituted to challenge the statute.

Note may also be taken of certain Federal taxes collected in U.S. possessions and paid into the treasuries of those possessions. For example, receipts from the processing tax on coconut oil produced in American Samoa and Guam (and also in the Philippines prior to 1946) are paid into the respective treasuries (I.R.C., sec. 7654). After operating revenues are deducted, the revenues from U.S. custom duties, taxes, and fees collected in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are transferred to the treasuries of those possessions (e.g., I.R.C., secs. 7651–7652; U.S.C., title 48, secs. 734, 740, 1401c). Additional provisions relate to taxes on certain drugs (I.R.C., secs. 4735, 4762).

PERTINENT COURT DECISIONS

It may be said at the outset that no act of Congress appropriating funds to the States has ever been held unconstitutional. However, the Supreme Court in the Butler case passing upon the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, made several pertinent observations. The act, it will be remembered, authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into adjustment agreements with farmers for the reduction of acreage of certain basic agricultural commodities, and imposed so-called processing taxes the proceeds of which were made available for the payment to farmers of benefits under the agreements.

The Court held the act unconstitutional on the ground (among others) that it was not a valid exercise of the Federal spending power under the general welfare clause since the act, although providing for agreements voluntary in form, was an attempt to coerce through economic pressure, and, even if not coercive, was at best a scheme for purchasing with Federal funds submission to Federal regulation of a subject reserved to the States. U.S. v. Butler (297 U.S. 1). The decision then pointed out—and it is this that is particularly relevant—the power of Congress to authorize expenditures impliedly conferred by the general welfare clause, is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in other clauses of the Constitution, but is limited in that Congress is required to act merely in furtherance of general or national purpose as distinguished from particular or local purpose.

The limiting words of the Supreme Court in the Butler case are about as strict as may reasonably be expected from the present or a future Supreme Court. In fact, there are those who consider that that decision has in effect been largely overruled, or at least reduced to narrow proportions, e.g. Steward Machine Co. v. Davis (301 U.S. 508 (1937)) sustaining the tax on employers to provide unemployment benefits.

One also finds such broad language as that rendered in a Federal district court decision declaring that the purpose of congressional appropriations, and the terms and conditions under which they are made, is a matter solely in the hands of Congress, and it is the explicit duty of the executive branch to comply therewith, and any attempt by the judicial branch to interfere therewith would be a plain invasion of the constitutional power of Congress. Spaulding v. Douglas Aircraft Co. (60 F. Supp. 985, affirmed 154 F. 2d 419).

As applied to the tax on coconut oil coming from the Philippines, question was raised concerning the validity of the tax. The Supreme Court in upholding the tax, Cincinnati Soap v. United States (301 U.S. 308 (1937)), said:

"It [the tax] is said to be bad because it is earmarked and devoted from its inception to a specific purpose. But if the tax, qua tax, be good, as we hold it is, and the purpose specified be one which would sustain a subsequent and separate appropriation made out of the general funds of the Treasury, neither is made invalid by being bound to the other in the same act of legislation. The only concern which we have in that aspect of the matter is to determine whether the purpose specified is one for which Congress can make an appropriation without violating the fundamental law. If Congress, for reasons deemed by it to be satisfactory, chose to adopt the quantum of receipts from this particular tax as the measure of the appropriation, we perceive no valid basis for challenging its power to do so."

CONCLUSION

In the light of the various decisions and long established Federal practice, the only way that a statute such as that contemplated is likely to be held unconstitutional would be to find that such an appropriation did not provide for the "general welfare." To requote the language of the Cincinnati Soap case, "The only concern which we have * * * is to determine whether the purpose specified is one for which Congress can make an appropriation without violating the fundamental law." Further, implicit in continuance of our Federal form of Government is continuance of strong and financially sound States. It can be argued with considerable force that the Federal Government—because of its "usurpation" of available revenue sources—has virtually closed the door to any successful major levy on these same sources by the States. It seems logical therefore to suppose that the Federal Government could so adjust its own rates that the States could share in the collections of the income or any other Federal tax. It would be extremely difficult to show that any such sharing violated our "fundamental law" or was contrary to the "general welfare" when its very purpose is the preservation of the Union which the Constitution established.

Finally, it may be noted that although numerous persons and organizations have proposed the sharing of revenues from certain taxes with the States, none of the proposals examined has considered the existence of any constitutional problem. Similarly, opponents of such sharing have based their opposition on other than constitutional grounds.

5. Payments by Federal Governments to States similar to payments under Canadian tax-rental agreements: There are numerous instances of Federal grants to States, but the most significant comparison with the Canadian system is to be found in Australia. There the Commonwealth, since 1942, has been the sole income-tax levying authority. Prior to that time, each State and the Commonwealth imposed its own income tax. It had been suggested in 1940 that the States, as a war emergency measure, should vacate the income-tax field in favor of the Commonwealth, but no action resulted. In 1942, the Commonwealth offered to make annual reimbursements to the States if they would cease to levy their own income tax, but the offer was rejected. The Commonwealth, notwithstanding State objection, enacted the necessary legislation effectively eliminating the States from the income tax and providing substitute reimbursements. The High Court of Australia upheld the act as constitutional. The original legislation was due to expire on June 30, 1946, but the Commonwealth announced its intention to continue it. However, as a result of conferences between Commonwealth and State representatives, a new formula of reimbursements—based largely on population factors—was written into the legislation. In addition, each year since 1949–50, special financial assistance grants have been made by the Commonwealth to supplement the tax reimbursements. The total budget estimates for tax reimbursements for fiscal 1957 amount to £153.6 million ($342.5 million), while other payments amount to £88.2 million ($196.7 million); the total is thus £241.8 million ($539.2 million).

The Australian system has been described as "less successful" than that in Canada, and has given rise to "most unfortunate" political consequences. In 1952, the Commonwealth actually indicated that it favored the restoration of the taxing powers to the States, but a conference to work out plans resulted in a deadlock.

ASSISTANCE TO SMALL-BUSINESS CONCERNS DISPLACED BY URBAN RENEWAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize disaster loans under the Small Business Act for small businesses which are displaced by urban renewal.

Congress has already recognized the plight of businessmen who are forced out of their establishments as a result of action by their communities to assemble land for redevelopment purposes.

As the Housing Act now stands, a relocation allowance of $2,500 is authorized. In S. 57, which passed the Senate in February, this amount was increased to $3,000.

But it is generally recognized that in many cases relocation costs considerably more than this amount. It takes a long time for a business to accumulate in a new location the goodwill it may have built up over the years in its original location.

Our bill proposes that the disaster loan provisions of the Small Business Act be made available to such establishments. This would permit loans to be made at low rates of interest to enable displaced businesses to reestablish themselves.

It seems logical that businesses displaced by urban renewal should be given the same treatment as those displaced by flood or other disaster. From the standpoint of the businessman, the consequences are about the same. In either case, his business is "washed out" and he must start over again.

I note that the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], has introduced a similar bill, S. 1340, which would make the same provisions available to businesses displaced by the highway program. Our bill may be considered a companion measure to his proposal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1777) to authorize assistance under the Small Business Act to small-business concerns displaced as a result of urban renewal activities under the Housing Act of 1949, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself and Mr. JAVITS), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

CREW LEADER REGISTRATION ACT OF 1959

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to require the compulsory registration of crew leaders who deal with the estimated 850,000 migratory agricultural workers in the United States. This administration measure, called the Crew Leader Registration Act of 1959, provides that any person who, for a fee, engages in recruiting, hiring, or transporting of three or more migrant workers for interstate agricultural employment must obtain a certificate of registration from the Secretary of Labor, subject to renewal every year.

The U.S. Department of Labor, which drafted this measure, reports there is increasing evidence that the channels of interstate commerce are being used by irresponsible crew leaders to spread the exploitation and abuse of our migratory agricultural workers, more than 400,000 of whom are of U.S. origin, including over 20,000 from Puerto Rico, while most of the remaining number are from Mexico and the British West Indies. Since these workers are very often dependent upon their crew leaders for transportation, employment, and adequate housing—and frequently receive their pay, which ranges between 40 cents and $1 an hour in most States, from these leaders—the desirability of making arrangements between crew chiefs and their crews a matter of record is obvious.

According to the President's Commission on Migratory Labor, where there are abuses, the most common ones practiced by crew leaders include failure to pay workers the full amount received from a farmer for their labor, charging a crew for transporting them to a job although the farmer himself is actually assuming that cost, loaning money to crew members at exorbitant rates of interest, and renting living quarters and similar facilities to the workers where, in reality, the expense is being assumed by the employer.

Under the terms of the Crew Leader Registration Act of 1959, every effort would be made to curb such exploitation by requiring that the approximately 10,000 crew leaders involved in migratory agricultural employment file information covering conduct and methods of operation on the job, their financial responsibility, transportation, wage arrangements, housing, and other working conditions concerning migrant workers in each crew, as required by the Secretary of Labor.

The Secretary may refuse to issue, may suspend, revoke, or refuse to renew a registration certificate on the ground that the crew leader has been convicted of a felony, been guilty of misrepresentation in application for a certificate, knowingly given false information to his crew concerning conditions of employment, failed to comply with the reported working arrangement for the crew, or failed to comply with the act or any regulations issued under it. Any willful violator of the act is guilty of a misdemeanor and is subject to a fine of $500, or imprisonment for a period of not more than 6 months, or both.

Migrant workers are the subject of deep concern of employers as well as all people in the United States. This administration measure is the result of very thorough research on the subject. I hope very much that the bill may have favorable and early action by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as well as by the Senate.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1778) to provide for the registration of crew leaders in interstate agricultural employment, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

COMPREHENSIVE OPERATION OF HYDROELECTRIC POWER RESOURCES

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide for the comprehensive operation of hydroelectric power resources of the United States.

The bill is in two sections. The first section provides for a number of changes in the Federal Power Act. It looks to coordinated operation of federally owned hydroelectric facilities with like facilities owned by public or private interests. Section 2 repeals subsection (f) of section 10 of the Federal Power Act as well as other acts or parts of acts which may be in conflict with the bill.

I hope that the committee to which the bill is referred will hold hearings at which all of the ramifications of the measure will be clearly brought out so that the country may know what is involved in this legislation. Doubtless amendments will be suggested that will further clarify the situation.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the bill, and a section-by-section analysis, prepared by me.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and section-by-section analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1782) to provide for the comprehensive operation of hydroelectric power resources of the United States, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following new section be added to the Federal Power Act:

"SEC. 31. (a) Whenever any hydroelectric facility owned by the Federal Government or by non-Federal interests is or will be benefited as a result of the construction, operation, or maintenance of any water-control facility, the parties owning or operating any of such Federal or non-Federal facilities may enter into an agreement or agreements, which shall be subject to approval by the Commission, for the coordinated operation of such facilities through regulation of reservoir releases, and the transfer, exchange, or sale of energy to provide power benefits at each party's power developments within the coordinated operation. All such agreements shall satisfy and discharge any and all obligations, as to the parties to such agreements, which would otherwise apply pursuant to the terms of subsection (b) of this section.

"(b) Whenever the owner or operator of any water-control facility owned by the Federal Government or by any non-Federal interest has assured the owner or owners of any hydroelectric facility or facilities owned by the Federal Government or any non-Federal interest that it will reasonably coordinate the operation of its facility so as to produce the optimum amount of firm energy for itself and all downstream owners of hydroelectric facilities, the Commission, after notice to the Federal or non-Federal agencies operating all such facilities, and after opportunity for hearing, shall determine and fix a reasonable and equitable annual charge which shall be paid to the owner of such water-control facility and which payment may, by agreement of the affected owners, be paid in power, energy, money, or in some of each; such annual charge to be apportioned among all parties in proportion to the additional amount of firm energy that each hydroelectric facility at site of the water-control facility and downstream from the water-control facility can produce as a result of coordinated operation, including storage releases; firm energy as used in this section means the amount of energy a hydroelectric facility is capable of producing with the full release of the stored water and such coordination of operations, assuming streamflows of a river basin equivalent to those experienced in the historical period of streamflows producing the minimum amount of energy: Provided, That in the event the Commission shall determine that, under operating conditions in a particular river basin, the use of hydroelectric facilities is primarily for peaking service, or for producing energy other than firm energy, then the Commission shall, in lieu of coordinated operation, after notice and opportunity for hearing, in the light of all the circumstances, including all benefits furnished by any facility to any other facility, whether upstream or downstream, determine and fix a reasonable and equitable annual charge to be paid to the owner of each facility furnishing such benefit by the owner of each facility receiving such benefits: And provided further, That in no case shall the resultant charge to any facility exceed the value of the benefits realized by such facility. In determining such annual charge, the Commission shall include, among other things, such part of the fixed annual costs of the facility furnishing the benefit, and of the annual operating and maintenance cost of such facility (including land rentals and similar charges) as the Commission may deem equitable, and where applicable, the Commission shall consider any costs incurred by the owners of the water-control facility and of downstream facilities for energy required to maintain firm energy: Provided, That the annual charges provided for in this subsection (b) shall not apply with respect to such of the affected owners as have entered into and are parties to a valid and subsisting agreement or agreements, subject to the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, for the coordinated operation of their respective facilities, reservoirs, or other water-control facilities referred to in this subsection.

"(c) The owner or operator of a water control facility will be considered to have assured the owner or owners of a hydroelectric facility or facilities that it will reasonably coordinate the operations of its facility within the meaning of subsection (b) of this section if such owner or operator files with the Commission at any time after the effective date of this Act a commitment commencing at the beginning of the following drawdown period of the water control facility involved and extending for a period of not less than five years to operate such facility on a coordinated basis in accordance with subsection (b); and on the filing of such commitment the provisions of this section shall become binding upon all interested parties, as of the date of such filing unless the Commission shall, within six months after the date of such filing, after notice and opportunity for hearing, disapprove the proposed coordination; provided further that such commitment may be extended for successive periods of one year by written notice filed with the Commission at least two years prior to the date on which it would otherwise expire.

"(d) In the event that an operator of a water control facility so operates as part of a coordination operation under subsection (b) of this section in such a manner as to result in a detriment to the owner of a hydroelectric facility, the Commission, after notice and opportunity for hearing, shall allow to the owner of the hydroelectric facility suffering the detriment such offset charges assessed under subsection (b) of this section as the Commission shall determine to be equitable, which offset shall be charged against the operator of the water control facility and such charge shall be included in the annual charge to be paid to the owner of the water control facility by the owners of all hydroelectric facilities in the coordinated operation. In the event the operator of a water control facility not operating as part of a coordination agreement or plan under subsections (a) or (b) of this section so operates as to unlawfully interfere with the natural flow of the river or to interfere with the storage releases of a water control facility upstream which have been released in accordance with a coordination agreement or coordinated plan pursuant to subsection (a) or (b) of this section and such interference results in a detriment to the owner of a downstream hydroelectric facility, the Commission, after notice and opportunity for hearing, shall determine and fix a reasonable and equitable charge which shall be paid to the owner of such hydroelectric facility by the owner of the water control facility creating the detriment.

"(e) Annual charges under subsections (b) and (d) of this section may be readjusted by the Commission, on its own motion or the motion of any interested person or organization and after notice and opportunity for hearing, at any time that changed conditions may so warrant.

"(f) All charges collected for the benefits provided by any facility owned by the United States shall constitute revenues of the facility providing the benefit and such revenues shall be disposed of in accordance with any provisions of law applicable thereto.

"(g) All parties affected by any determination under subsection (b) or (d) of this section (except any agency of the United States) shall bear a reasonable share of the cost to the Commission of making the determination, and all such parties shall pay their share of such cost, as fixed by the Commission, into the Treasury of the United States for credit to miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That in fixing the reasonable share of the cost each party is required to pay by this subsection (g), the Commission shall apportion the total cost among all parties, including Federal agencies affected, notwithstanding the fact that no payment into the Treasury is required to be made by such Federal agencies.

"(h) Appropriations or other funds available for operation of the facility concerned shall be available to pay the annual or other charges or costs that may be assessed against or payable by the United States, or any agency thereof, pursuant to the provisions of this section.

"(i) No party receiving a notice under subsection (b) or (d) of this section shall be required to pay annual charges under this section for benefits received prior to the effective date of this section or be required to pay annual charges under this section for benefits received more than 5 years prior to the date on which the Commission gives notice to such party as provided in subsection (b) or (d) hereof; nor shall any party receiving a notice under subsection (b) or (d) of this section be required to pay to any non-Federal interest annual charges under this section if it is paying or is required to pay similar charges under State law."

SEC. 2. Subsection (f) of section 10 of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C., sec. 803(f)) and all other acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed and the following subsections of said section 10 are redesignated accordingly: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall in any manner affect any right or obligation which vested or accrued prior to the effective date of this act.

The section-by-section analysis presented by Mr. MURRAY is as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF S. 1782

For clarity the changes are presented by Federal Power Act section designations.

SECTION 1 OF THE BILL

Section 31(a) authorizes voluntary agreements between various owners of water control facilities and hydroelectric facilities when there is a benefit that is, or may be, gained by operating such various facilities in a coordinated manner. The Federal Government as well as any other owners of such facilities are authorized to negotiate such operating agreements. All such agreements are subject to approval by the Federal Power Commission.

The subsection authorizes such agreements to regulate reservoir releases and transfer, exchange, or sell energy among the parties for the benefit of each party. The execution and approval of such agreements would excuse the parties from any other obligation to pay for headwater benefits as required by later sections of the bill. Such agreements are purely voluntary and no one can be bound unless they agree to the terms of the contract. Such an agreement would not excuse the obligation to make any payment called for under the present section 10(f) of the Federal Power Act up to the effective date of the bill.

(b) This subsection establishes the procedure to be followed only in the event that voluntary agreements as authorized by subsection (a) cannot be negotiated. Federal and non-Federal projects are subject to its terms.

An owner or operator of a water control facility (typically, a reservoir) may declare his intention to operate his reservoir in such a manner as to provide the optimum amount of firm energy for the group composed of himself and all downstream hydroelectric facilities. The procedure for declaring such intention is set out later in the bill and such reservoir owner is required to file a plan for such method of operation. If the operating plan is found to be reasonable, then each downstream beneficiary becomes obligated to pay his equitable portion for the benefits conferred by such reservoir. If such reservoir owner does not submit a reasonable operating plan or does not submit any plan at all to operate for the mutual benefit of the whole group, then such resorvoir owner is not entitled to any payment at all for headwater benefits.

Once a plan for coordinated operation is found to be reasonable the Commission will determine a reasonable and equitable annual charge which will be paid to the reservoir owner and will also apportion such charge among all beneficiaries in proportion to the additional amount of firm energy that each beneficiary can produce as a result of the coordinated operation. The amount of such annual charge to be paid by a particular beneficiary is further limited to the value of the benefits realized by such facility. Thus the total amount to be paid to any reservoir owner is limited to an equitable portion of the fixed costs and operating costs of the reservoir, and the amount that will be paid by a particular beneficiary is limited by the value of the benefits he receives. All determinations to be made by the Commission will be made after notice and opportunity for hearing.

The subsection sets forth, without limitation, some of the costs an equitable portion of which will be included in computing the annual charge to be paid to reservoir owners. The costs are the fixed annual costs of the reservoir, the annual operating and maintenance costs of the reservoir (including land rentals and similar charges) and costs incurred by reservoir owners and downstream owners for energy which they require to maintain the firm energy level allowed by the coordination plan.

A proviso in the subsection establishes rules for the payment of headwater benefits in the event that hydroelectric facilities in a particular river basin are used primarily for peaking service or secondary energy rather than for the production of firm energy. Under such conditions, coordinated operation will not be a condition precedent to payment for headwater benefits; on the contrary, an equitable charge will be assessed, based on whatever benefits are conferred.

Taking this proviso together with the rest of the subsection, it means as follows: If coordinated operation can reasonably produce additional firm energy, then a reservoir owner must operate his reservoir in coordination with downstream plants in order to qualify himself to receive any payment for headwater benefits. If the physical circumstances in an area indicate that the hydroelectric facilities are used primarily for a purpose other than the production of firm energy, then the reservoir owner is entitled to equitable payments for headwater benefits without the necessity of coordinating his operation with those below him.

The subsection defines "firm energy" as that term is used in the bill. The subsection provides that payments required by the bill may, by agreement of the affected owners, be paid in power, energy, money, or in any combination of those media.

(c) This subsection sets forth the procedure for establishing a coordination plan under subsection (b) if negotiations for a voluntary agreement under subsection (a) have failed. In order to qualify himself for any payment under subsection (b) a reservoir owner or operator must file a commitment to operate his storage facility on a coordinated basis with all facilities downstream from him. The commitment must be filed with the Commission prior to the commencement of the storage control period of the water control facility involved and it must commit the reservoir owner to so operate for a period of not less than 5 years. Anyone affected by the coordinated commitment may object to such a commitment. Affected parties will be entitled to argue, among other things, that the area does not lend itself to coordination for firm power production and is thus within the first proviso of subsection (b) or that the coordination plan to which the reservoir owner seeks to commit himself, is unreasonable in one or more particulars.

If the Commission does not disapprove the proposed coordination within 6 months after the date of filing the commitment, the reservoir owner will have satisfied the requirement for assurance to downstream owners as set forth in subsection (b). The reservoir owner will thus have qualified himself to receive payments for headwater benefits and will have obligated himself to operate on a coordinated basis in order to produce the optimum amount of firm energy that can be produced by the group composed of the reservoir owner and all downstream owners.

(d) This subsection is composed of two separate matters, each described in a sentence. The first sentences relates to a situation where the owner of a facility is a party to, and bound by, a coordination plan under subsection (b). If such a facility is operated in a manner which results in a detriment to any other facility within the coordination plan, then the Commission shall allow to the injured owner, an equitable offset against the charges assessed to him under subsection (b) and the Commission shall include such offset in computing the annual charge to be paid to the reservoir owner and apportioned among downstream parties.

The second sentence of the subsection relates to a water control facility which is not part of a coordination agreement or plan under subsection (a) or (b). If such an owner operates his facility so as unlawfully to interfere with the natural flow of the river or to interfere with storage releases which have been released from upstream in accordance with a coordination agreement or plan and if such interference results in a detriment to a downstream facility, the Commission, after notice and opportunity for hearing, will fix a reasonable and equitable charge to be paid to the injured party by the owner creating the injury. This portion of subsection (d) allows the Commission to determine and assess damages caused by interference with coordinated operation or with natural stream flow.

(e) This subsection provides that charges which are established by the Commission may be readjusted by the Commission on its own motion or the motion of any interested party at any time that changed conditions so warrant. Notice and opportunity for hearing are required for any such readjustment.

(f) Subsection (f) provides that sums collected by the United States under this bill will be revenues of the facility providing the benefit and be disposed of in accordance with all applicable provisions of law.

(g) This subsection states that all affected parties shall pay their reasonable share of the Commission's costs in making its determinations and that a reasonable portion of such costs will be allocated to the United States if it be an affected party although no cash need be paid by agencies of the United States.

(h) Subsection (h) provides that appropriations or other funds which are available for the operation of any affected Federal facility shall be available to pay such costs or charges as may be assessed against the United States.

(i) This subsection states that no party will be required to pay annual charges under section 31 of the bill for benefits received prior to the effective date of the section. Also, no one would be required to pay such charges under section 31 for benefits received more than 5 years prior to the date on which the Commission gives notice to a party under subsections (b) or (d). Thus, the provisions of section 31 do not operate retroactively. On the other hand, the Commission and reservoir owners are encouraged to proceed as fast as possible in making the necessary determinations under the bill because assessments will be limited to the period of not more than 5 years prior to the time that the Commission institutes its proceeding.

This subsection also provides that a party is excused from paying annual charges to any non-Federal interest if they are already required to pay similar charges under State law. This provision is intended to prevent double assessments against owners, particularly in Wisconsin, who are already subjected to charges for improvements maintained by the State.

SECTION 2

Section 2 of the bill repeals subsection (f) of section 10 of the Federal Power Act and includes a general repealer of other acts or parts of acts which may be in conflict with the bill. However, the section also provides that nothing in the bill shall excuse or otherwise affect any obligation which may have accrued under section 10(f) or in any other manner prior to the effective date of the new law. Any obligation which, as of the effective date of the new law, has been assessed or is awaiting computation and assessment under prior law remains collectible.

19. Expand act to apply to the several States, the District of Columbia, the several Territories and the several possessions of the United States, the Panama Canal Zone and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

20. Include provision for conversion from Federal to State charter and vice versa.

21. Include Bureau of Federal Credit Unions under provisions of Administrative Procedure Act.

22. Make robbery of a Federal credit union a crime under Federal statute.

WORLD PEACE THROUGH WORLD LAW

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for not more than 5 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Pennsylvania may proceed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators HUMPHREY, CARROLL, CHURCH, JAVITS, KEFAUVER, KENNEDY, MCGEE, MORSE, MOSS, NEUBERGER, PROXMIRE, SYMINGTON, GRUENING, and myself, I submit for appropriate referral, a concurrent resolution providing for the strengthening of the United Nations to promote world peace through world law.

Identical concurrent resolutions are being submitted in the House of Representatives today by Representative CHARLES O. PORTER, of Oregon, and a substantial number of Members of the other body who share my concern, and that of my colleagues who are cosponsoring this concurrent resolution, with the problem of advancing the cause of world peace through world law before the delicate balance of terror is shattered and we find ourselves embarked on world war III and the destruction of Western civilization.

It has been clear for some time that more vigorous efforts should be made by our Government and, indeed, by all the governments of the free Western World and of the uncommitted world as well, to making a start towards substituting world law for the present reliance on armed force which endangers world peace. This movement has been supported in part, at least, in a recent address by the Vice President of the United States. It also has received the support of the American Bar Association and of many other civic organizations.

I suggest, Mr. President, that the Congress should urge the executive arm of our Government to move forward at a high level with steps intended to put the United States firmly on record in support of world peace through world law. It is clear that pious resolutions will not do the job. The practical way to advance this cause is through appropriate changes in the United Nations Charter.

The United States supported a resolution approved by the United Nations in 1955 calling for a "general conference to review the charter at an appropriate time." A U.N. Committee on Arrangements will meet in the summer of 1959 to determine whether to recommend to the fall session of the U.N. General Assembly that a charter review conference be convened.

I have been informed that the former leadership in the State Department was giving no special consideration to the substantive issues of charter review and was planning to take a position against the calling of a review conference at the coming meeting on the U.N. Committee on Arrangements.

This matter has already been held in abeyance for too long without constructive action. We must not let pass the opportunity presented by the meeting of the U.N. Committee to be held this summer to bring about a start toward the development of a system of world law.

The purpose of the concurrent resolution is to express the sense of the Congress that the U.S. position in the forthcoming meeting of the Committee on Arrangements for a conference for the purpose of reviewing the charter should be that the Committee recommends to the next session of the U.N. General Assembly that a charter review conference be held within 1 year following the action of the Assembly on the recommendation of the Committee. The concurrent resolution further requests the President to initiate high level studies in the executive branch of the Government to determine what changes should be made in the Charter of the United Nations and the charters of other international organizations to which the United States is a party, to promote a just and lasting peace through the development of enforcible world law.

Mr. President, I feel confident this is a field in which Congress can and should take the initiative. I am hopeful that the new leadership in the State Department will look with favor on this move. For that reason I submit the concurrent resolution to which I have referred; and I now ask unanimous consent to have the concurrent resolution lie on the desk for a period of 1 week in order that other Members of the Senate who are in accord with our position may have an opportunity to join as cosponsors.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the resolution will lie on the table 1 week, as requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25), submitted by Mr. CLARK (for himself and other Senators), was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the basic purpose of the foreign policy of the United States is to achieve a just and lasting peace; and

Whereas there can be no such peace without the development of enforceable world law; and

Whereas peace does not rest on law today but on the delicate balance of terror of armed force; and

Whereas the United Nations and other international organizations constitute an important influence for peace and need to be strengthened to achieve the rule of law in international relations; and

general conference to review the Charter shall be held at an appropriate time"; and appointed a "committee consisting of all the members of the United Nations to consider, in consultation with the Secretary General, the question of fixing a time and place for the conference, and its organization and procedures;" and

Whereas the United Nations General Assembly at its twelfth session resolved "to keep in being the Committee on Arrangements for a conference for the purpose of reviewing the Charter, * * * and to request the Committee to report, with recommendations, to the General Assembly not later than at its fourteenth session;" and

Whereas the said Committee is scheduled to meet in the summer of 1959 in advance of the fourteenth session of the General Assembly to be convened in New York in September of 1959: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the United States position at the forthcoming meeting of the Committee on Arrangements for a conference for the purpose of reviewing the Charter, should be that the Committee recommends to the fourteenth session of the United Nations General Assembly that a charter review conference be held within 1 year following the action of the Assembly on the recommendation of the Committee.

SEC. 2. The President is hereby requested to initiate high-level studies in the executive branch of the Government to determine what changes should be made in the Charter of the United Nations, and the charters of other international organizations to which the United States is a party, to promote a just and lasting peace through the development of enforceable world law. The President is further requested to report to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, within 6 months after the date of approval of this resolution, the results of such studies.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENT

Mr. MCCARTHY submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PARTICIPATION IN STRASBOURG CONFERENCE—REFERENCE OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No 196, Senate Concurrent Resolution 23, authorizing participation in the Strasbourg Conference, be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration for consideration. This request is made with the knowledge of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and in accordance with the advice rendered by the parliamentarian.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CLARK:

Address delivered by Senator SYMINGTON before Democratic City Committee of Philadelphia, Pa., on April 21, 1959.

By Mr. BYRD of West Virginia:

Address delivered by Senator YARBOROUGH at the Texas Classroom Teachers Association annual convention banquet, Dallas, Tex., April 18, 1959.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATIONS OF LEWIS W. DOUGLAS AND MARK A. MAY TO BE MEMBERS OF U.S. ADVISORY COMMISSION ON INFORMATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate today received the nominations of Lewis W. Douglas, of Arizona, and Mark A. May, of Connecticut, both reappointments, to be members of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Information for terms expiring January 27, 1962, and until their successors have been appointed and qualified.

In accordance with the committee rule, the pending nominations may not be considered prior to the expiration of 6 days.

BRISTOL BAY (ALASKA) RED SALMON INDUSTRY

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, the people of Alaska are gravely concerned, as the people of the entire Nation should be, with the threatened extinction of the Bristol Bay red salmon fishery. This has been the greatest red salmon fishery in the world. It has provided food for many; employment for thousands; and millions of dollars have been invested.

In 1952 we entered into a treaty with Canada and Japan. Under the terms of that treaty, Japan agreed not to fish for salmon east of a designated line. So far as can be determined, the Japanese have faithfully adhered to the treaty provisions in that respect.

Little was known then about the migrating habits of these salmon, but the considered judgment of American fishery scientists was that very few Alaska-spawned salmon would be found west of the treaty line. This proved to be an erroneous judgment of the first magnitude. Year after year since then, according to the best evidence available, the Japanese have been taking millions of salmon which were spawned in Alaska streams entering Bristol Bay. Many of these fish were immature.

The Japanese use nets which are strung out for miles. These nets, being of much finer mesh than Americans are permitted to use in their shore-based fishery, catch fish of all sizes. Americans are not permitted to fish for salmon on the high seas. The result of all this has been a steadily diminishing pack of salmon in Bristol Bay. This has dealt a blow to investment capital.

More importantly, it has put fishermen and cannery workers out of employment. Virtually the entire population of Bristol Bay is dependent for their livelihood upon fishing operations of one kind or another. Three times in recent years President Eisenhower has been forced to declare Bristol Bay a disaster area.

The treaty contains provisions for redesignating the fishing boundary. But unanimity is required to make any change, and the Japanese have refused to agree to this urgently needed revision.

Now Secretary of the Interior Seaton has stated that, in the interests of conservation, he will be required to close Bristol Bay to commercial fishing in 1959. Perhaps even today Secretary Seaton will announce the regulations closing the bay to all American fishing.

The effect of this will be devastating. Thousands of Alaskans will be thrown out of work, and will have no other work to turn to. And other American citizens who customarily have gone to Bristol Bay from other States for the fishing season will likewise be denied employment.

Inevitably, conservation measures of this type will fail. All they will insure is another season, or a few more seasons, of fishing for the Japanese on the high seas. Then all of the salmon will be gone. There will be no more. The greatest red salmon fishery in the world will have been destroyed by man.

This need not happen. It can be avoided. It can be prevented by prompt action now.

In an editorial which appeared recently in the Anchorage, Alaska, Daily News, it was suggested that "only the Secretary of State himself can save the Bristol Bay red salmon from extinction." With that conclusion I agree.

We of the Alaska congressional delegation, joined by like-minded conservationists in Congress from the Pacific coast particularly, have urged time and time again that negotiations be conducted promptly on the highest level. This resource must be saved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial referred to printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONLY HIGHEST AUTHORITY CAN SAVE BRISTOL BAY

The closure of Bristol Bay to fishing indicates that the American State Department has waited too long and has done too little to get at the source of the trouble there. It is now perfectly obvious that the high seas fishing by the Japanese has done more harm than all the Bering Sea inshore fishermen, than all the seals, sea lions, and other enemies of the salmon in 50 years.

Prior to 1953, when the Japanese high seas fishing fleet, under protection of the peace treaty, expanded its encroachment to the waters just off Bristol Bay about 4,000 American fishermen and allied workers were engaged in the Bristol Bay fishing industry each season.

Prior to the Japanese entry into the North Pacific the 10-year average fish pack in the bay area was 917,000 cases. These would be worth $30 million on today's market. Even the curtailed pack of 1958 amounted to 433,000 cases.

The 1959 pack will be zero.

Meanwhile, our nice friends across the Pacific packed 1,061,307 cases in 1957, which was worth $37 million.

And here is an interesting sidelight on the Japanese pack. According to our scientists the Japanese caught 19,822,000 salmon to put up that size pack. By American standards this number of fish should have produced over 1,650,000 cases, indicating beyond a doubt that the Japanese are not only catching our salmon, but subjecting the runs to terrific waste by using immature fish.

Thus the Japanese are not only catching the salmon that rightfully belong to us but are jeopardizing the perpetuation of the entire species of Pacific red salmon. Someday there will be none.

Legislation to place huge tariffs against Japanese caught salmon is not the answer.

The answer lies in reopening negotiations with the Japanese at the highest level in Washington.

A recent letter from the New England Fish Co. of Seattle points this out very succinctly in a paragraph in which it is asked:

"Is our status with our friends among the free nations such that we cannot settle a matter such as this on a basis that would carry out the spirit and intent of the international convention for high seas fisheries for the north Pacific Ocean? The Japanese action is a flagrant violation of that spirit and intent."

This is too true.

Only the Secretary of State himself can save the Bristol Bay red salmon from extinction.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF ALASKA LEGISLATURE

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, many of my colleagues in the Senate and in the House will remember the very effective testimony given on several occasions in favor of statehood before committees on either side of the Capitol by Mrs. Mildred R. Hermann, of Juneau. Mrs. Hermann was as effective a witness for statehood as ever came down from Alaska, and she was the star whenever she took the witness chair.

Mrs. Hermann, who is one of the few women attorneys in Alaska, has been writing a column for several Alaska newspapers describing the activities of the first Alaska State Legislature, which adjourned only last week.

In a column which was printed in the Fairbanks (Alaska) Daily News-Miner for April 20, Mrs. Hermann evaluated the accomplishments and failures of this first session. She found it, on balance, to be a highly productive session.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, immediately following my remarks, Mrs. Hermann's postsession column.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIGHLIGHTING THE LEGISLATURE

Time to evaluate!

Time to evalute. Was it a good legislature?

On the whole, yes. We found the manner in which much of the business was done, in wide variance from the traditional democratic processes.

But the results cannot be gainsaid. These achievements stand out as tributes to a job well done:

1. It passed a reorganization bill setting up the executive department of state government. This was a stupendous task. No such responsibility ever before confronted any first State legislature. It was accomplished in spite of almost overwhelming pressures from established agencies, boards, and commissions. The vote for the legislation was almost unanimous. By this action the first State legislature rightly takes its place with the delegates of the Constitutional convention who wrote and agreed upon the executive section. In a true sense the legislators too are the founding fathers of the 49th State.

2. It passed legislation setting up a judiciary system for the new State that may well become the model for the other 48 States of the country. A few other States have established similar judicial systems. It was left to the newest State to establish what political scientists and government experts have pronounced the best State court system of them all. In this achievement also is implemented the system set up in the constitution.

3. It set up a balanced budget for the first year of statehood. We could be wrong but we do not believe another State in the Union has a balanced budget. Furthermore, Alaska's budget was balanced without decreasing the essential services that her citizens have a right to expect.

4. It levied no new taxes. We take a special pleasure in saying, "I told you so," on that one.

Before a half dozen congressional committees, dozens of civic organizations and everyone we could get to listen, we have again and again asserted that statehood could be financed within the framework of the tax structure we had as a territory. It has been done for this first year of statehood.

On the basis of these four accomplishments alone the first State legislature is entitled to take a bow. It faced up to a stupendous responsibility. It met the challenge of that responsibility. It had problems that could not be foreseen. A sick Governor, a demanding public, some internal strife and lack of liaison between the two houses. There was lack of experienced members in the house. Only 9 out of 40 members had had previous legislative experience. The other 31 had to learn from the ground up. The important fact is that they did learn, in time to be an effective force in the legislature. They will do better when they come back next January.

It would be folly to claim perfection for the legislature. It made many mistakes. We have previously pointed these out. We deplored its tendency toward extravagant salaries. We regretted its subservience to labor lobbyists—or any lobbyists. We think too much legislating was done by caucus. We feel too much reliance was placed on committee reports. We felt greater thought should have been given by the rank-and-file membership to such measures as the general appropriation bill. The casual way in which almost 30 million dollars of taxpayer money was appropriated, we found actually shocking. If there was a treasury watchdog he slept in his kennel throughout the session.

We did not like some of the bills which were enacted into law. We foresee obstacles to Alaska's development in the new ESC bill—a measure on which labor lobbyists really cracked the whip. But we balance against this the fact that very generally the legislature stood firm against the pressure of lobbying by industry, by fishermen and sportsmen's organizations and by the biggest and most amateurish lobby of all, the education lobby.

And so by a preponderance of evidence we find that when all the tangible results are added up, it was a good legislature. Its errors in judgment can be corrected at subsequent sessions. The things it left undone can be done next January, but it has given Alaska a firm basis on which to start statehood.

And for that, we believe, history will accord it due acclaim.

SENATOR WILEY AND FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the April 22, 1959, issue of the Christian Science Monitor there appears an article written by Courtney Sheldon, entitled "A Senatorial View of Foreign Policy." It is the result of a Capital interview with the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

Mr. President, no Senator, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, has been more wholeheartedly in support of the administration's foreign policy—whether the administration was Democratic or Republican—than has the distinguished ranking member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on the minority side, the senior Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator, who at one time was chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, when the Republicans were in control of this body, has, in my opinion, followed in the footsteps of the late, great Senator Arthur Vandenberg, of Michigan. He has been consistent and constructive; and, because of the many contributions he has made to a bipartisan, or, if you will, a nonpartisan, view on foreign policy, I ask unanimous consent that the news story be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SENATORIAL VIEW OF FOREIGN POLICY

(By Courtney Sheldon)

WASHINGTON.—Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, ranking Republican on the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a long-time supporter of internationalist foreign policy:

Observes that "Recent events seem to indicate things are not going so well between Mao and Khrushchev; that the Kremlin is using the recent Tibet episode as a basis for informing some of its people lying close to China that this is what could happen to them one of these days."

Can "visualize a summit conference where the sky is the limit. * * * We could take the offensive and ask Russia to give up its so-called colonies. * * * It might have some resounding effects."

This is how the veteran midwestern Senator with an impressive accumulation of political know-how, and a record of loyalty to President Eisenhower's internationalist foreign policy, made his points in an interview in his Senate office:

"With the resignation of Mr. Dulles, does it look to you, Senator WILEY, as if President Eisenhower will be any more active in the formulation of foreign policy?"

"I think events since Mr. Dulles' sickness indicate clearly that the President is taking a larger and, let us say, a broader view of his activities and is relying more on his own ability to handle these problems."

"Apparently Mr. Dulles didn't rely as much on the State Department staff as other Secretaries have and presumably as much as Mr. Herter will. Is this, in your opinion, going to result in some modification in foreign policy?"

"I'm satisfied that we will continue pursuing our basic objectives. Now, whether there will be modification in details, that will depend not so much on our approach as upon the approach of the fellow whom we are dealing with—for instance, Khrushchev. What's going to be his attitude at these conferences that come up?"

"On the immediate crisis in Berlin, do you favor standing firmly by the status quo, or do you think that some change in policy is in order?"

"Well, again it is a question of what can be arrived at. It isn't for me to tell the executive branch of this Government what it should do.

"The only thing I want to say is that Berlin is just an incident in this troubled world. While we are thinking about Berlin the Kremlin is over there taking over Iraq and penetrating Africa. Every day they are having young Africans shunted up to Moscow and infiltrating them with their Communist Marxist concepts."

"Why do you think Mr. Khrushchev stirred up the Berlin crisis at this particular time?"

"Well, there are two explanations. First, there is the old philosophy that when you are having trouble at home you stir up things abroad. That's been the practice of dictators.

"The other is that he is, of course, conscious of history. Russia has been invaded and they can't forget what Hitler did to them. We can't overlook what you call the human factors, the hates, the distrusts of people. And, of course, there has been and will continue to be the economic factors where there is the race for markets."

"Generally speaking, what about the advisability of summit conferences?"

"There is always a possibility that lightning will strike Khrushchev—by that I mean that reason, judgment, might enter into his thinking.

"On the other hand it seems to be the general conclusions of those who analyze such things that when the Russians say they are going to take over the world, that the Marxist philosophy is going to become the dominant basis for world thinking, every step they take is part of a long-planned campaign."

"On the question of a summit conference, would you favor holding one with a wide-open agenda, if necessary, or would you require that we wait until the foreign ministers found enough common ground to indicate there would be definite agreements coming from a summit meeting?"

"That is a function of the executive department. I can visualize a summit conference where the sky is the limit. In such a setting we could take the offensive and ask Russia to give up its so-called colonies, the countries it has taken over. In other words, we could have a three-ring circus on practically every subject. It might have some resounding effects in the world."

"Now, do you think there is any merit in the members of the Foreign Relations Committee, yourself as the senior Republican and Senator FULBRIGHT as the chairman, being part of any summit delegation?"

"Well, in the history of this country, there have been two lines of thought on that subject. The one is that when it is an executive function, the executive should handle it. The other is that because this situation is so tremendously significant and involves the welfare of 175 million people it would be well to have some observers along, if you want to call them that, or advisers, such as you have mentioned."

"Have there been any feelers from the administration along this line?"

"I know of none."

"It doesn't appear that Congress will go along with the President in full on the mutual security program. Does it look that way to you?"

"No, I can't say that. There's considerable disagreement on military items. But, in my judgment, the amount spent on military aid is the most essential part of that program to keep the balloon from going up.

"There are those who want to put everything into economic aid. Well, economic aid, or if you want to call it something else, is all right, but when a person is sick you had better diagnose his situation. You want to see just what is needed and not generalize the picture."

"How serious do you regard the Communist threat in the Middle East, principally in Iraq?"

"The taking of Iraq is a very, very serious thing. What the Kremlin wants is the oil in the Mideast. It wants also a land route to Africa. Fortunately Nasser has got his dander up and maybe he will stand as a barrier in part."

"Finally, on the Far East, do you favor more or less sitting tight on our present policy there, or do you feel that there might be something done now while there is a lull on the Quemoy-Matsu front, so the same problem won't arise again?"

"I don't think there is anything in the Eastern picture that indicates there is a solution to that problem. What has happened in Tibet clearly put Mao Tse-tung in the doghouse with a lot of people who heretofore thought China should be admitted to the United Nations. The situation there is serious and we can expect anytime a repetition of what happened in Matsu and Quemoy.

"But, recent events seem to indicate things are not going so well between Mao and Khrushchev; that the Kremlin is using the recent Tibet episode as a basis for informing some of its people lying close to China that this is what could happen to them one of these days. There is lots of land there.

"The fact of the matter is that part of it now occupied by the Russians was at one time in the possession of the Chinese people; that several centuries ago they were pushed out by the Muscovites."

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, during the course of the debate on the labor reform bill, I have been introducing into the RECORD various editorials and columns appearing in newspapers around the country concerning the measure. Today I have two such items to offer for the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Sunday Tribune, Apr. 12, 1959]

FEDERAL LAW IS URGED ON RACKET PICKETING

(By William Clark)

Summary report of an interview:

New Federal legislation is necessary to protect small business against racket picketing.

(Racket picketing is a term applied frequently to (1) organizational picketing in which a union places pickets around a company to persuade employees inside to join, and (2) recognition picketing in which a company is picketed to coerce the employer into recognizing it as bargaining agent by forcing his employees to join the union.)

There is no remedy, now, at the State level because even the smallest manufacturer these days is considered to be engaged in interstate commerce. And a half dozen years ago the Supreme Court of the United States, in overruling a State court injunction in a picketing case, held that the Federal Government had preempted the whole field of labor relations in the Taft-Hartley and other laws.

MOST OTHER BILLS INEFFECTIVE

Moreover, of the various pieces of labor legislation before the current Congress, only the Barden bill attacks the problem of racket picketing effectively.

The interview which produced these assertions was with James L. Donnelly, executive vice president of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association and John Harrington, associate counsel for the association.

The interview was promoted by the recent stand against a teamsters union local taken by Advance Metal Moulding Co., Addison. The president of the company, John Piepel, refused to force his 38 production and maintenance employees to join the union despite picketing which shut off deliveries to the plant.

The pickets were withdrawn from Advance after Piepel's stand was publicized. Left unanswered, however, was the question of whether there is legal defense against organizational and recognition picketing—in effect, picketing by strangers when there is no dispute between an employer and employees.

DOUBT LEGAL DEFENSE

According to Donnelly and Harrington the existence of any such a defense at present is doubtful. Organization and recognition picketing do not come under the mandatory provisions of the Taft-Hartley law as do secondary boycotts and some jurisdictional strikes.

If an employer is hit by organization or recognition picketing, he may be able to get a ruling that it is an unfair labor practice and he may not. And if he does, it may only be after a lapse of several weeks of picket-enforced idleness which a small firm simply cannot afford.

The Barden bill would place organization and recognition picketing under the law's mandatory provisions. That is, when such picketing occurred it would be mandatory for the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board to apply for an injunction to stop it.

A few years ago a seed company reached that time of the year when it had to deliver its seed to farmers or suffer a fatal financial setback, Harrington recalled.

A Teamsters Union local threw up pickets to enforce its demand that it be recognized as bargaining agent for the employees. The employer signed within 15 minutes after the pickets stopped his deliveries.

"In my own experience, all of the recognition and organization picketing we've encountered in the last 5 years has been by Teamsters Union locals," Harrington said.

LOSE ELECTIONS, HE SAYS

He speculated that unions resort to such picketing because they have been losing too many employee elections conducted under normal circumstances since the McClellan committee began its investigation of labor racketeering.

Of the other labor bills under study in Congress, Donnelly described the Kennedy bill as "mild reform legislation which would not in any real sense get at the basic causes of union corruption and abuses."

He said the administration (Goldwater) bill is better, but "has appeasement features and reflects to some extent the administration's naive effort to woo labor leaders."

[From the Oakland Tribune, Apr. 10, 1959]

NEW SENATE LABOR BILL BASED ON FINDINGS OF RACKETS INVESTIGATORS

Now is the time that people who have views on proposals for labor legislation, soon to be considered by Congress, to make those views known to the men who represent them in Washington. If there are any who have not formed an opinion on the various offerings, we recommend the measures which bear the name of Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN.

Senator MCCLELLAN, because of his direction of the Senate investigation into labor organizations and rackets, has not only produced evidence of unholy alliances and operations all along the line. He has also acquired a personal knowledge of the actual situation.

The measures he proposes for correcting the evils his committee has revealed are for that purpose alone. They do not aim at political benefit. They are not designed to be approved by or opposed by either labor or management. They are designed strictly to meet the demands and the needs for proper, sufficiently rigid and not totally lacking, controls that protect the public interest.

The McClellan program would require all unions to include in their constitutions and bylaws, provisions guaranteeing equal rights of members, freedom of speech and assembly, safeguards against arbitrary disciplinary action, the right to inspect membership lists, secret ballots, limits on terms of officers, bonding of all officers handling funds and regular meetings.

They provide for public financial reporting, the banning of secondary boycotts and organizational picketing, outlaw the hot cargo clause in contracts, and permit States to take action when the NLRB declines to intervene.

There is nothing there that an honest and conscientious labor leader or member of the rank and file should consider unjust. Suitable penalties are provided for violations.

The measures proposed by the administration and that offered by Senator JOHN KENNEDY each fall short of the protection for the public and the rank and file offered in the McClellan program.

So, now is the time for the public to recall the headlines that have over the months in the past 2 years stemmed from the exposures of a wide range of thievery, racketeering, physical violence, and other malpractices, and let Washington know how it feels about it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I have in my hand a resolution which was adopted by the Senate of the State of Texas, senate resolution 424, on April 22, 1959, signed by the president of the senate, and carrying the seal of the State of Texas. The resolution in effect denounces the contents of the Kennedy bill, and lauds the principle expressed in the McClellan bills.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 424

Whereas the Kennedy bill purports to be legislation designed for the best interest of the general public in the protection of the workingman from the influence of corrupt unions, but in fact the bill is couched in such language as perverts the true intention of the principles ostensibly expressed; and

Whereas the Kennedy bill preempts the field of activities of the various States of the Union and is an infringement of the rights of the State and is usurping sovereignty of Texas, as well as other States of the Union, particularly in that the law, as proposed, fails to preserve the remedies under State law to the individual members of the organizations purposely regulated by, and coming within the purview of said proposed law; and

Whereas the Senate of the State of Texas, by this means, expresses its concern for the welfare of the people of the State of Texas: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the State of Texas oppose the invasion of its rights, and that the Congress of the United States substitute the principles expressed in the McClellan recommendations in lieu of the Kennedy bill; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the U.S. Senators and Congressmen from Texas.

THE GREENBRIER HOTEL, WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. VA.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I should like to take this occasion to invite attention to a famous West Virginia resort institution which is older than my State, almost as old as our Nation, and which, for more than a century, has been a haven of relaxation for the leaders of this Republic.

I am referring, of course, to the stately, magnificent Greenbrier Hotel at White Sulphur Springs, only a few hours removed from this Capital City of Washington, D.C.

Since the year of 1749, when King George of England granted a patent right to one Nathan Carpenter regarding that lovely valley surrounding a bubbling sulfur spring in the gentle Allegheny Mountains, what pleasurable respite has that spot brought to generations of men, wearied from seeking solutions to the problems of state and business.

Here in the southern tip of my Mountain State, our Nation's leaders found a retreat, a spot generously endowed not only by Mother Nature, but also with the ingenuity of men born to the traditions of hospitality, knowing in the ways of creating true comfort. Here, those who have charted the course of our country found, and are still finding, a spot which could give them new perspective, where they could meet with other men seeking answers to the same questions, where they could discuss with or without the formality of the conference table the problems of the day, whether the day be 1820, 1920, or this morning.

Mr. President, the history of the Greenbrier at White Sulphur Springs is studded with the names of the country's most illustrious men. Here Henry Clay, a frequent visitor, met with Rufus Choate, of Massachusetts, Thomas Corwin, of Ohio, William C. Rives, of Virginia, and Millard Fillmore, of New York, to plan the strategy of the Whig Party. Here Daniel Webster delighted to come, for his favorite "corn dodgers" were a specialty of the kitchen.

Here Andrew Jackson, the first of the 14 Presidents who have visited the Springs, set up his summer White House. Here Van Buren called a conference with his Secretary of War and other statesmen when the banks of the country discontinued specie payment in 1837. Here John Tyler honeymooned with the beautiful Virginia belle, Julia Gardiner. Here Franklin Pierce arrived in a Concord coach drawn by six white horses with plumes on their heads. Here Fillmore, Taylor, and Buchanan also were part of the Greenbrier's ante bellum history.

During the Civil War, the predecessor of today's Greenbrier, the Old White, showed no favoritism, but harbored both northern and southern troops, depending upon the tide of battle.

It was to White Sulphur Springs that Gen. Robert E. Lee came in 1867 to discuss with Beauregard, Johnston, Hood, and ex-President Jefferson Davis the conditions of the South and to attempt to bring back to life the war-torn land. At virtually the same time, President Ulysses S. Grant also paid a visit to the resort. Then in 1868 the White Sulphur Manifesto was signed. Engineered by Gen. W. S. Rosecrans, Minister to Mexico, and written by A. H. H. Stuart, it was a summation of all General Lee had been pleading with his countrymen to do—to conciliate vengeful elements in the North, to accept defeat, and to appeal for justice.

Here Senator Henry Gassaway Davis of West Virginia was officially notified by Representative John Sharp Williams of Mississippi that he was the nominee of the Democratic Party for the Vice Presidency of the United States in 1904. Here William Howard Taft campaigned at a barbecue. Arthur, Harrison, and Wilson each added his presence, too, to the delightful company which has been enjoyed down through the years at White Sulphur Springs. When President Eisenhower wanted to have a neighborly talk with the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of Mexico, he invited them to the Greenbrier, where the historic three-country conference was held in 1956.

There is probably no resort in the United States richer in political, historical, and cultural tradition than the Greenbrier at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va. No other resort has served its country so well. During World War II, our soldiers were restored to health there, as the Greenbrier served as the Ashford General Hospital.

Untold thousands of our citizens have journeyed to this small corner of West Virginia to find the perfect elements to renew their spirits. They, like the 14 American Presidents and hundreds of other American leaders who have visited White Sulphur Springs, have found this princely spa a stimulating environment for relaxation. We could learn much about the growth of our country if the old oaks standing near the White Sulphur Springs could talk, for its existence as a resort virtually spans the national existence of our country. What interesting opportunity for reflection its sylvan scenes provide.

Mr. President, as a West Virginian, I am proud for this opportunity to pay tribute to this Edenic landmark of American history, which remains fully active in our national life today.

NATIONAL HOSPITAL WEEK, MAY 10–16, 1959

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, about this time each year our country's great voluntary hospital system sponsors an annual national open house, inviting all our citizens to celebrate the role of our community hospitals in their daily lives.

I should like to direct attention at this time to the observance of National Hospital Week sponsored by the American Hospital Association, which will be observed this year from May 10 to May 16.

I have long felt that we will have made a giant step toward enduring world peace when all men share the hope of health and physical well-being to at least the same degree as we today share fear and subservience to the specter of nuclear war. When this time comes, man no longer will heed those who seek to turn the unhappiness, the physical and mental discontent of others to their own selfish purposes.

But so long as fear rules, as long as its exploiters have an audience among the unhealthy and unhappy peoples, we in this Nation must look upon health as equally important to national security as are our atomic engines of destruction. For it is upon our collective vitality and strength that the security of this Nation today depends fully as much as upon atomic weapons. Health is our greatest resource. Nothing enhances national security more than the strength, self-reliance, and happiness that come to people who are assured of physical well-being for themselves and their children. Nothing can sap a nation's strength—the strength within her people—faster than the menace of disease and debility.

The chosen theme of this year's National Hospital Week is "More Roads to Recovery"—a particularly appropriate theme when one considers the constantly expanding services our hospitals are providing to bring us all longer life and better health. All of us here need no reminding of the tremendous progress of medicine in recent years. It is a progress which has created a new world of health. Millions are alive today only because of modern medicine. Two decades have been added to the average life span since 1910. Hospitals today have become more and more the centers of new life, new hope, and new strength.

Good medical care and its indispensable component, good hospital care, are now true necessities for modern living. Increasingly, the roads to recovery from illness and injury are centering in the hospital. Responsibility for carrying out the disciplined teamwork of many skilled professional and technical workers is centered in the hospital.

It is in today's hospital that the skilled hands and costly tools are in constant readiness to serve 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, around the year. Our hospitals must always be prepared to meet the unpredictable need, whether for the patient already under care or individual emergencies, or for community disasters.

The emergency entrance of our community hospital is a door that is always open. The smallest, simplest hospital today offers services—roads to recovery—that were unknown in even the great medical centers of yesterday and hospital services are steadily becoming more comprehensive. In 1946, there were 4,400 short-term hospitals—only 53 percent of these had electrocardiographs. By 1957, there were 5,300 short-term hospitals and 92 percent had these essential medical tools, basic for evaluating a heart condition.

But figures never tell the full story of the increased services today's hospital affords our people. Back of the services and behind complicated health machinery stand the dedicated men and women. Today's hospital combines the skill of the physician, nurse, pathologist, radiologist, therapist, laboratory technician, and a host of other medical specialists who give themselves to the service of their fellow man.

If our hospitals are to keep open the many roads to recovery they offer today, they must have continued and increasing support from the public they serve. In an era of explosive growth, our hospitals must depend as never before upon community understanding and community support if comprehensive services of high quality are to be made available to all the people.

How fitting and proper it is that the Nation should set aside a time in which to observe the importance to our people of today's American hospital.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONTRACT WITH ARISTOTELES ONASSIS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TANKERS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, today I wish to discuss a contract which has just been negotiated by the Maritime Administration and Mr. Aristoteles S. Onassis, a Greek shipowner, and one which I definitely consider not to be in the best interests of the American taxpayers.

In the Wall Street Journal of Friday, April 10, 1959, the Maritime Administration is quoted as stating that they have just signed an agreement with Mr. Onassis to build three tankers at a cost of $51,300,000.

Under the agreement, these tankers are to be built at the Bethlehem Steel Co.'s Quincy, Mass., yard. Two of the tankers will be 46,000 deadweight tons, costing $12,650,000 each, and the third will be 106,800 deadweight tons, costing $26 million.

My criticism of this contract is based upon two points:

First, it represents another $8 million windfall for Mr. Onassis.

Second, Government money is being used to guarantee a mortgage representing 87½ percent of the construction costs of three ships which are being built by a wholly-owned foreign company.

I will discuss the $8 million windfall later, but first, I wish to establish the ownership of Victory Carriers, Inc., the Onassis company which has just signed the contract with the Maritime Administration.

The Maritime Administration in signing this contract attempts to justify its decision as being in the best interests of the American taxpayers by emphasizing that the three tankers will be operated by American citizens under the American flag.

Two years ago when discussions by the Maritime Administration and Mr. Onassis were being held in connection with this same contract, I raised the question with the Administration as to whether or not if the contract were completed the U.S. Government would be required to underwrite a part of the construction costs, either in the form of construction differential subsidies or in the form of a Government guarantee of the mortgage, and I was given this written assurance:

> There has been no financial assistance granted by the Maritime Administration in connection with the construction of the three new tankers by Victory Carriers, Inc., either in the form of construction differential subsidy, or insured mortgage guarantee, or other forms of Government aid.

Now that the contract has definitely been signed, however, we are advised that notwithstanding this assurance the Government will be required to underwrite 87½ percent of the construction costs of the three tankers.

These three tankers under the newly negotiated contract will be constructed by the Victory Carriers, Inc. This company is a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Delaware with an authorized capitalization of 2,000 shares of no-par-value stock. This stock has all been issued and is owned entirely by the United States Petroleum Carriers, Inc.

It is true that the officers and directors of Victory Carriers, Inc., are listed as being American citizens, but these men are mere figureheads. They do not own a single share of stock in the company.

The officers and directors of Victory Carriers, Inc., are as follows: Granville Conway, president and director; Nicolas Cokkinis, vice president and director; Peter Spalding, vice president; Thomas R. Lincoln, vice president; Charles S. Cunningham, director; John C. Griswold, director; and Edmond J. Moran, director.

It is absurd to claim that these men control a company in which they own no stock, nor do these officers and directors own any stock in the parent company, the United States Petroleum Carriers, Inc.

The United States Petroleum Carriers, Inc., which owns Victory Carriers, Inc., is another Delaware corporation, with an authorized capital of 1,000 shares no-par-value stock.

Of this stock, 750 shares are held in a trust fund established for the benefit of Mr. Onassis' children. This trust was established under an agreement dated August 10, 1956, between Aristoteles S. Onassis, an Argentine citizen, and the Grace National Bank of New York City, with the bank acting as trustee.

In anticipation of the need to establish an American identity to some of his companies and thereby qualify for U. S. Government aid, Mr. Onassis arranged that his two children be born in this country. This had the effect of giving dual citizenship to the children by virtue of the fact that a person born in this country automatically has a right upon reaching the age of maturity to claim American citizenship regardless of the citizenship of his parents.

These two children, who are beneficiaries of the trust established by Mr. Onassis and financed with some of his earlier windfall profits, are presently at ages ranging from 8 to 11. They are naturally being kept with their parents, whose present residence is Bern, Switzerland.

With their father a Greek presently living in Europe but maintaining citizenship in Argentina, what assurance can we possibly have that these children will claim American citizenship upon reaching the age of maturity rather than adopting the citizenship of their father?

Certainly it is a very loose thread upon which the Maritime Administration hangs its claim that these ships are financed through an American owned company because the children's trust fund owns 750 shares of stock in that company. This is particularly true when we consider that the remaining 250 shares are owned by another foreign company of Mr. Onassis, the Sociedad Industrial Maritima Financiera Ariona, Panama S.A. This Panamanian corporation in turn is owned and controlled by Mr. Aristoteles S. Onassis, registered as an Argentine citizen, and Messrs. N. Konialides, another Argentine citizen, and C. Konialides, listed as an Uruguayan citizen.

Yet this is the company which the Maritime Administration describes as being under the control of American citizens, and this is the company that under this recently proposed contract will get an 87½-percent mortgage guarantee on the construction costs on the building of three tankers.

When Congress passed the law establishing the authority whereby the Maritime Administration could guarantee up to 87½ percent of the construction costs of new tankers, it was done with the definite understanding that all ships constructed under this Government guarantee would be not only controlled but also owned by citizens of the United States of America.

This precaution was taken on the basis that should an emergency develop whereby our Government would need these tankers they would be at the disposal of our country.

Certainly, there can be no assurance that this Greek shipowner who has transferred his own citizenship throughout the world, based upon where he could get the most favorable tax consideration, would have any love or loyalty to the United States of America. It is perfectly ridiculous to find that our Government is putting up seven-eighths of the construction costs of the ships foreign owned and controlled, and it is even more ridiculous to find it giving him another $8 million windfall to sign the contract.

This is particularly hard to understand when we find that the past record of Mr. Onassis' dealing with the Government of the United States of America has been far from satisfactory.

This is not the first time that serious questions have been raised in Congress as to the special treatment which the Maritime Administration and the other departments of the Government have extended to this individual.

With the true ownership of the company now established, I will discuss the $8 million windfall for Mr. Onassis as contained in this same agreement; however, in order to show this $8 million windfall it will be necessary to go back a couple of years and first discuss a $20 million windfall which had been approved for this same company. The $8 million windfall involved in this contract is a part of the $20 million arrangement.

Early in 1957, the attention of the Congress was called to the fact that special permission had been given by the Maritime Administration whereby Mr. Onassis and his companies would be permitted to transfer 14 ships—12 tankers and 2 Liberty cargo ships—from the American flag to a flag of foreign registry.

These 14 ships had been purchased from our Government about 8 years previously at very low prices in relationship to world market valuations on the basis that they wold be kept and operated under the American flag.

This ruling or approval by the Maritime Administration to transfer these vessels from the American flag to foreign registry automatically increased their value over $20 million based upon figures supplied by the Maritime Administration itself at the time of the transfer.

This was a $20 million windfall for one decision coming from the Maritime Administration of the Department of Commerce and was denounced as such at that time by other Members of Congress as well as by me.

The reason these 14 vessels had a substantially lower valuation when operated under the American flag is that the operators were required to pay American standard of wages. When transferred to foreign registry, their seamen could be hired at much lower wages and the operator would be free to charge the maximum rates, subject only to competitive conditions. With a shortage in shipping on world basis, the earning power was substantially greater under a foreign flag.

Another incentive to increase the valuation under foreign registry is that the owners would not be subject to American taxes.

At this point it should be noted that just a few months prior to this favorable ruling by the Maritime Administration, permitting Mr. Onassis to transfer these 14 ships to foreign registry, Congress had rejected legislation to do the same thing. We rejected the proposed legislation on the basis that these vessels had been sold at greatly reduced prices with the proviso that they be kept under the American flag and to reverse this now would result in large windfall profits for the owners. Had there been no objection to these vessels being placed under foreign flag, the Government should have sold them accordingly and reaped the additional price for the taxpayers.

At this point, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD a table showing the cost of the 12 tankers when constructed new and the net sales price received by the Government when sold to Mr. Onassis' companies:

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, next I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD an excerpt from a letter dated April 9, 1957, signed by Mr. Clarence G. Morse, Maritime Administrator, in which he gives the value of these same 12 ships in world market prices at the time the ruling granting the transfer was approved.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Under foreign registry the estimated valuation, on a restricted basis, of the 14 vessels will be: $3,400,000 for each T-2 tanker, and the Olympic Games, and $1,500,000 for each of the Liberty dry cargo vessels. However, these ships are not eligible for resale except with prior Maritime Administration approval.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the complete letter from which this excerpt was taken was incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 9, pages 11307–11308.

It was based upon these two reports from the Maritime Administration that the $20 million windfall was computed.

When this ruling was approved in 1957, thereby making possible this $20 million windfall, the Maritime Administration attempted to justify it on the assumption that Mr. Onassis, through the Victory Carriers, Inc., was to construct three tankers of the same description as involved in the present contract. These tankers were to be constructed in American shipyards and operated under American ownership, and the tankers were to be constructed by Mr. Onassis' company without the benefit of any Government guarantees or subsidies. Furthermore, as a part of the earlier agreement which the Maritime Administration obtained in exchange for their favorable ruling, the contract carried the proviso that in the event that Mr. Onassis failed to build the ships as agreed upon, he would forfeit $8 million to the U.S. Government.

The Maritime Administration emphasized three points when defending their earlier contract of 2 years ago with Mr. Onassis:

First. That the tankers were being build without any Government assistance.

Second. They will be controlled by American owned companies.

Third. As a protection to the American taxpayers in the event that the contract were forfeited, the Government could collect $8 million in cash forfeit from Mr. Onassis.

Now what happened?

After Mr. Onassis got his favorable ruling he did not build the tankers as agreed. The Government filed suit to collect the $8 million forfeiture. The Government also asked the Federal district court to order a forfeiture of the 14 ships and the recovery of 18 months of profits under the foreign registry.

Before these cases were decided, the Maritime Administration and Mr. Onassis resumed negotiations on another contract to build the same three ships but on different terms. Under the new agreement the following terms were stated:

First. The Government drops its claim for the $8 million forfeit which Mr. Onassis owed under the previous unfilled agreement. This, in effect, is an $8 million gift to Mr. Onassis and eliminates the possibility of the Government ever recovering any of the $20 million windfall.

Second. The Government drops its suit in the Federal district courts, in which it had requested the courts to order the forfeiture of the 14 ships and the recovery of 18 months of profit under the foreign registry.

Third. The Government will guarantee a mortgage up to 87½ percent of the construction costs of the vessels.

Last, but far from least, we cannot overlook the fact that all of this series of convenient arrangements was negotiated between a Government agency and a company which is controlled by citizens of foreign nationalities.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, has morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business has been concluded.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. What is the pending question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no pending business. The unfinished business will not be laid before the Senate under the rule until 12 o'clock, but may be taken up earlier either on motion or by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Presiding Officer may lay before the Senate the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the pending business.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment numbered 4–17–59–JJ and ask that it be made the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 50, line 5 through line 11 it is proposed to strike out all of subsection (h) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Labor organization" means a labor organization engaged in activities affecting commerce and includes any labor union or any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee, association, group, or plan, so engaged, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, conditions of work, or other matters incidental to employment relationships, and includes further any conference, joint board, joint council, or other local, State, regional, national, or international organization or association composed of representatives of such labor organizations or in which such labor organizations are associated or with which they are affiliated.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, my amendment applies to the definition of "labor organization" which appears on page 50 of Senate bill 1555.

I have had placed on the desks of my colleagues a paragraph or two outlining what would be the result of such action. I shall read the statement.

The amendment would modify the definition of a "labor organization" contained in the committee bill. The committee bill, as in both the Wagner and Taft-Hartley Acts, defines a "labor organization" as one in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of engaging in collective bargaining. Conferences, such as the Western Conference of Teamsters, formerly headed by the notorious Frank Brewster, joint boards, and councils are not composed of employees and do not engage in collective bargaining. The committee bill's definition thus does not include any conference, joint board, joint council, or other association or aggregation of representatives of labor unions, thus freeing them from the sanctions, prohibitions, and other requirements of the bill.

This amendment includes in the definition of "labor organization" such conferences, joint boards, councils, and other associations of representatives of labor unions in order to bring them under the committee bill.

Mr. President, some of the most sordid testimony brought to light during the McClellan committee investigations centered around the improper activities and dealings of Frank Brewster, the former head of the Western Conference of Teamsters. Brewster's misappropriation of union funds for his own personal use and enjoyment was spelled out in detail before that committee. His purchase of a racing stable, complete with trainers and stable boys paid for with union funds, illustrates the shocking disregard the crooks, racketeers, and other parasites in the union ranks have for the funds entrusted to their care by union members. What is of great concern, Mr. President, is the fact that the committee bill does not even cover the Western Conference of Teamsters and so the activities of the Frank Brewsters can go on uncontrolled and unrestrained.

The reason for this loophole afforded to the Western Conference of Teamsters and others is that the committee bill defines a "labor organization" as one in which employees participate and which exists in whole or in part for the purpose of engaging in collective bargaining. Obviously, since a conference or joint board is not made up of employees and does not engage in collective bargaining, it is not a labor organization within the meaning of the committee bill.

We have Mr. Brewster's own word before the McClellan committee that the Western Conference of Teamsters is not a labor organization within the meaning of the Taft-Hartley Act. Brewster was asked by a member of the committee whether the Western Conference had complied with section 9 (f) and (g) of the Taft-Hartley Act, requiring unions to file organization and financial statements with the Secretary of Labor and whether he had filed a non-Communist affidavit. He readily admitted that neither he nor his organization had ever filed these statements and affidavit, and, furthermore, were not required to do so, since the Western Conference of Teamsters is not a labor organization within the meaning of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Unless this amendment is adopted, Mr. President, some of the most corrupt and racket-infested unions can continue to prey upon honest and decent dues-paying union members completely free from the criminal sanctions and prohibitions contained in the committee bill.

Mr. President, I understand that my good friend from Massachusetts feels some legal questions are raised by the amendment with respect to the interpretation of the language in the bill. His staff and my staff have been trying to draft some language which would be acceptable to the chairman. I wonder whether that has been accomplished.

Mr. KENNEDY. We have come to an agreement, and what we have evolved is a substitute for the language of the Senator's amendment. I believe it accomplishes what should be done. I believe it will be satisfactory to a majority of the committee. I shall read the proposed amendment and then send it to the desk.

On page 50, at the end of line 11, we propose to strike out the period and add the following language: "and any conference, joint board, joint council, or other association or aggregation of labor organizations other than a State federation or central labor council or an association formed to carry on educational activity or to represent its members before any judicial, administrative, or legislative body."

Mr. GOLDWATER. The only question I have—and I will not press the point—is with respect to a central labor council. We have had very little experience with these groups. In fact, we have had some detailed knowledge with respect to only one of them. The Senator from Massachusetts may recall this instance. It concerns the Wayne County Central Council of Michigan, a group which an investigation made by the Select Committee To Investigate Campaign and Lobbying Activities, disclosed was actively engaged in politics. Inasmuch as union dues money was used to support the central council, I am wondering if we would be wise in requiring that they not report. They are excluded in the amendment the Senator suggests. As I say, I shall not press the point, because we do not know a great deal about these organizations. However, it seems to me there would be a possible loophole created if we allowed a group supported with union dues money to spend the money and not report it.

Mr. KENNEDY. I believe the language which the two staffs have worked out will cover such organizations as councils and joint boards, which properly should be covered. I hope we can go ahead on this matter, because I believe sufficient protection is given to the public interest in the form the language of the proposed amendment has been drawn.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Our staffs have worked on it. I am happy that the Senator from Massachusetts, with his usual understanding, has seen fit to go along. It is an improvement in the bill, and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send my substitute for the Goldwater amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 50, at the end of line 11, it is proposed to strike the period and insert the following: "and any conference, joint board, joint council, or other association or aggregation of labor organizations other than a State federation or central labor council or an association formed to carry on educational activity or to represent its members before any judicial, administrative, or legislative body."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as 4–20–59–R.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12, line 2, beginning with the word "shall", it is proposed to strike out all through line 5 and insert in lieu thereof "who makes or agrees to make—".

On page 12, line 19, to strike out ", during the fiscal year,".

On page 13, lines 11 and 12, to strike out "or any promise or agreement therefor,".

On page 14, line 4, to strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma.

On page 14, between lines 4 and 5, to insert the following: "shall file with the Secretary within thirty days after making or agreeing to make such payment or expenditure a report signed by its president and treasurer or corresponding principal showing in detail the date and amount of each such payment or expenditure and the name, address, and position, if any, in any firm or labor organization of the person to whom it was made, and a full explanation of the circumstances of all such payments or expenditures, including the terms of any agreement or understanding pursuant to which they were made."

On page 15, line 20, to insert "or agreed to make" after "made".

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, this is what I regard as a strengthening amendment for the further protection of unions and working people. In the course of the investigation, the select committee found flagrant instances concerning the employment of what are known as labor consultants or middlemen. Some of the tactics they have used, some of the expenditures they have made, and some of the courses they have followed have not been, in my judgment, consistent with proper practices and activities in labor-management relations.

I call attention to the fact that in the bill as it is now written, the report which is required by the employer with respect to the employment of consultants or middlemen would not have to be made by the corporation or management interests which employed the middlemen or consultants until after the end of the employer's so-called calendar year for reporting. An agreement might well be made during one calendar year, and the payment of compensation to the middlemen might be made some time in the following year. Thus, whatever he is doing, whatever he is employed to do, whatever moneys are being paid to him or are promised to be paid to him, or any evil, if there is any evil, in his relationship to the employer for the purpose for which he is employed, does not become exposed until after the end of the calendar year or until after the end of the time when all the acts may have been perpetrated; and whatever knowledge of them came to the workers or to the labor organization would be of no benefit to them whatsoever, because it would already be an accomplished fact.

What is proposed by the amendment is that, instead of requiring the employer to file his report with respect to expenditures or the promise to make such expenditures, he must file such a report within 30 days after the expenditures are made or after it has been agreed to make them. Thus, when such an arrangement has been entered into, the unions and the employees will have the opportunity to have knowledge of it 30 days after the arrangement has been made, not a year later, or in some instances, perhaps, 2 years later, when it has become too late for the information to be of any value or to do any good.

I think this is a strengthening amendment, one which will be of benefit, beyond doubt. If the substance of the legislation in this area has any real benefit to offer at all, this amendment will insure greater benefit. Considering the protection and service which the provision in the bill is intended to afford, if the reporting as required by the amendment I have offered is done, rather than as is now provided in the bill, the real benefits and fruits of the legislation will inure to the benefit of the labor organization and its members.

Mr. President, I ask to modify my amendment as follows:

On page 14, line 8, strike out "file annually" and insert in lieu thereof: "within 30 days after the undertaking or agreeing to undertake such activities."

I submit that the amendment, as modified, is in line with the general purposes I have sought to achieve in the proposed legislation, namely, to make use of the very best language possible in order to afford the protections in the areas in which it has been found that conditions which need to be remedied prevail. I think that if the employer is to be permitted to employ consultants—and he certainly should be permitted to employ them—when he employs them for the purpose set forth in section 103 of the bill, knowledge of such employment should come to public attention at the time or shortly thereafter—within 30 days thereafter—rather than a year afterward, or even longer. I submit that the amendment is one which has real merit and should be adopted.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I understand, instead of the employer having to report whatever payments he makes to the middlemen annually, he will submit to the Secretary of Labor a report every time such a payment is made. In other words, if he employs a consultant on a retainer basis and is paying him every month, he will submit his report to the Secretary of Labor on that basis. Is that the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. McCLELLAN. No. If he has made an agreement to pay a stipulated fee or a stipulated salary at the time the agreement is made, it is the purpose of my statement to have him report that fact within 30 days.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to ask the Senator concerning the words "any expenditure" on page 12, line 19. In other words, under the language of the Senator's amendment, an employer would have to make a report every time he has paid a bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The intention is to publish the information within 30 days of the time the payment is made or at the time the agreement is made to make the payment.

Mr. KENNEDY. A number of these payments are legal, as the Senator knows. As I understand the amendment, it is proposed to ask every employer who has a labor consultant on his payroll or who is working for him on some matter which is legal under the Taft-Hartley Act and under the bill, to file with the Secretary of Labor a report giving the amount and the purposes thereof every time he makes a commitment with a labor relations consultant and agrees to employ him.

Mr. McCLELLAN. No, it is not the intention to have him file a report every time he makes an agreement or a payment. I think the Senator will agree with me that if the information and the arrangements can be made known to the public or to those who are interested and affected before the work is completed, then the information may serve a useful purpose. But if we waited until a year afterward, and then had a report submitted, no information would be available until after the proceeding was all over.

Mr. KENNEDY. A member of the staff suggests that what we are concerned about is the question of the frequency of the reporting.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; but that is not the purpose. If some revision of the amendment is needed, in order to make certain about that point, very well.

But I believe the Senator from Massachusetts will agree with me that if the information were not made available at the time of the happening, it would probably be of little value a year later. That is the point.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it seems to me that the purpose of the amendment is fine.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. However, it will be sufficiently difficult to administer the act, with thousands of reports coming in. We do not want to require them to be made on a monthly or a bimonthly basis, because then the administrative problem would be insuperable.

I am concerned with the frequency of the reports. It would be possible for a perfectly legal arrangement to be made between a middleman and an employer; but we would not wish to require, by means of this amendment, that every time the employer made a legal payment of a bill, it would be necessary for him to file a report.

I wonder whether we may have a quorum call at this time, in order that we may study this matter a little further.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Certainly.

Let me state that I offer the amendment in all good faith.

Mr. KENNEDY. I understand.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I offer the amendment because I honestly believe that if the information were not supplied until a year later, it would then be of little or no value.

So I believe the amendment is a very constructive one.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, with the agreement of the Senator from Arkansas, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I had hoped that Senators who are interested in the bill, especially those who are interested in amending it—there are some 100 amendments at the desk—would be prepared to call up some amendment or discuss some amendment, so that the Senate might vote on it, rather than to spend the day having quorum calls.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Arkansas. [Putting the question.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed that a new version of the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Arkansas, is now being prepared. Apparently no other Senator wishes to call up an amendment at this time. Embarrassing though it is, I shall again suggest the absence of a quorum. I hope it will be possible to have the language of the amendments to be offered in such shape that they will be ready to be called up.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it would be extremely helpful to the members of the committee and the committee staff if we could have some idea of the order in which, for example, the next three or four amendments will be called up. This will prevent our slowing up the work of the Senate. The amendments are extremely complicated. An amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] was rewritten and a substitute offered. It was finally accepted after a period of 45 minutes. Since numerous amendments are at the desk, it would help us if we could have advance knowledge of the order in which they will be called up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have consulted with the Senator from Arizona. He is temporarily detained. His staff is attempting to weed out amendments which they think it may not be necessary to call up. The Senator from Arizona will notify us as soon as possible of the disposition which has been made of those amendments. I will also explore with him the possibility of indicating which amendments he desires to call up next. In the meantime, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Presirent, I am informed that the Senator from Arkansas is now ready to proceed. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to substitute for the amendment which I originally offered a substitute amendment as revised and redrafted. I ask for the immediate consideration of this amendment as a substitute for the amendment originally offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the amendment as follows:

On page 12, line 6 through 18, strike out subdivision (1) and renumber subdivision (2) as subdivision (1).

On page 13, lines 10 through 24, strike out subdivision (3) and renumber subdivision (4) as subdivision (3).

On page 14, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following new subsection:

"(b) Every employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce who makes or agrees to make—

"(1) Any agreement or arrangement with a labor relations consultant or other independent contractor by which such person undertakes activities where an object thereof, directly or indirectly, is to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise, or persuade employees as to the manner of exercising, the rights to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, or undertakes to supply such employer with information concerning the activities of employees or a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute, except information for use solely in conjunction with a judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceeding;

"(2) Any payment or loan, direct or indirect, of any money or other thing of value, or any promise or agreement therefor, to any labor organization or any officer or employee of any labor organization except (i) payments pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement the terms of which have been fully disclosed to the employees in the bargaining unit, (ii) compensation paid to an officer or employee of a labor organization for, or by reason of, his services as an employee of such employer, (iii) payments or loans made by any national or State bank, credit union, insurance company, savings and loan association, or other credit institution, and (iv) payments of the kind referred to in section 302(c) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended; shall file with the Secretary within 30 days after such agreement or payment a report signed by its president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers describing such agreement in detail and showing the date and amount of each payment or expenditure, made or to be made, and the name, address and position, if any, in any firm or labor organization of the person to whom it was made, together with a full explanation of the circumstances of all such payments or expenditures."

On page 14, line 5, reletter subsection (b) as subsection (c) and reletter the following subsections and references to subsections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, so far as I know, the staff representing the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and my assistant, have now prepared the amendment in such form as to do what both the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and I think should be done in the area covered by the amendment. The amendment is satisfactory to me; I hope it is satisfactory to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment is to provide that when a legal payment is made, and a report is required at the time an agreement is made—the language is quite precise in this respect—it is then necessary for the employer to make a report to the Secretary of Labor.

When an agreement which is legal under the Taft-Hartley Act and under this act and under other laws is made with a labor-relations consultant, he shall file the report on an annual basis. I think that meets the problem which has been suggested by the Senator from Arkansas; and, on the other hand, it maintains orderly processes and easier administration of the act.

So I hope the amendment in its present form will be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 36, it is proposed to strike out lines 24 and 25.

On page 37, in line 1, it is proposed to strike out the first three words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, this amendment has to do with the giving of written notice to the members of unions to advise and notify them when an election is to be held.

The bill as it now stands, as I understand, does not require that written notice be given, provided the constitution of the union sets forth the time and place of the annual or biennial election.

By means of this amendment, I am trying to make certain that every union member will receive a written notice at least 15 days before an election is to be held. Many union members drive trucks or are on the road or are otherwise busily occupied in their various activities, and do not follow closely the constitutions of their own locals. It would be better if they did; but the reality of the matter is that they do not. In the economy of time, perhaps they cannot.

So I think it very little to require that a union mail a postal-card notice 15 days before an election of officers is to be held, to remind the membership and to notify the membership that the election is to be held. That is not asking very much.

I have heard it stated that the basis for objection to the amendment is that it will be costly and therefore burdensome to require a union to mail such a notice to its members. But that argument is not impressive to me.

Most unions are not large. The few unions that are very large also have very large treasuries. So the cost of mailing a notice of this kind to the members would not seem to me to be at all burdensome.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to vote for adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. DODD. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. Is it not a fact that most business and professional organizations and, in fact, most organizations of other types follow the practice of mailing to their members notices of elections?

Mr. DODD. Yes. I know that I receive notices from the few organizations in which I hold membership. I think that is done almost universally, except in the case of some labor organizations. I am frank to say, with reference to some of them, that I believe they do not mail such notices because they do not want their members to know when the election will be held.

Mr. SMATHERS. Is it not also a fact that most religious organizations which are preparing to hold elections, notify their members of the time and place of the election?

Mr. DODD. Yes; that is a common courtesy in the case of most organizations.

Mr. SMATHERS. I do not believe that any organization which wanted to hold a full, democratic election could in good conscience resist this amendment.

Mr. DODD. Yes; I fully agree. I cannot understand the resistance to the amendment, on the flimsy basis that to comply with it would cost a few dollars.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Connecticut has brought up an important point. An amendment similar to the one he has proposed was considered by the committee. Finally the amendment was withdrawn.

I have alternative language which I hope the Senator from Connecticut will find of some benefit.

As the bill now stands, a notice must be mailed to every member of a union, unless the date for the election is formally fixed publicly in the union's constitution. It seems to me that if it is set forth in the union's constitution, that would make unnecessary the rather heavy bill for mailing such notices, because every member who participates in a union, and who is likely to participate in an election, will certainly know the date of the election, if it is formally set forth in the union's constitution, and if the union's constitution, along with the bylaws, is available to all the members.

But in the cases in which the union's constitution does not do that, the union will have the obligation of mailing such notices.

I should like to see how that plan will work. I believe the bill is quite adequate in providing remedies for improper elections.

I wish to explain to the Senator from Connecticut—because I know of his experience in some of these fields—that I believe the committee has dealt with the problem in a harmonious and satisfactory way; and I think the vote finally taken in the committee on the provision on this point which the committee had before it was unanimous.

Mr. DODD. But I do not think it is adequate; that is precisely why I have offered this amendment.

I have read that provision of the bill; and the Senator from Massachusetts has stated it accurately and clearly. His point is that in the case of organizations which have constitutions in which the election date is stated, there will be no need, under the bill as it now stands, to have such notices mailed to the members.

But, as I have already stated, the reality of the situation is that most of the members of unions do not carefully examine their unions' constitutions and do not study such matters. So a brief notice on a 2-cent postcard will take care of this matter; and the total cost will be only a few dollars.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The notice will require a 3-cent postal card. [Laughter.]

Mr. DODD. Very well; a 3-cent postal card.

Certainly it does not make sense to me that the big, powerful labor organizations should resist so simple, decent, and honest a proposal—namely, to require that a postal-card notice be mailed to each of the members, to inform them when the election will be held.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield again to me?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. Most Senators belong to the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, or similar organizations; but I venture to state that not one of them knows when the next election of the organizations to which he belongs will be held. In fact, I doubt that many Senators even know when their church's next election will be held. That does not mean they are not interested in the elections; it simply means they do not keep in mind the election dates.

Most organizations send election notices to their members, to notify them when the elections are to be held.

So I firmly believe in this amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. DODD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I am very happy to support the amendment which has been submitted by the Senator from Connecticut. I have a similar amendment at the desk. I was also successful, in committee, in having that provision included in the bill. It was approved, as I suggested yesterday, but was reconsidered later. Still later it was modified in such a way as to be meaningless insofar as union members themselves are concerned.

As the Senator has very ably pointed out, realizing these elections are held anywhere from 1 to 2 to 3 years, I think it is improbable that the average member of a labor union will remember the date specified in the bylaws or constitution, if, indeed, he ever has had an opportunity to read them. We know that some of the more unscrupulous labor leaders have made a practice of keeping this information from their members in order that they may continue to dominate the affairs of unions, and particularly to keep themselves in positions of power.

I think it is an amendment which by all means should be adopted.

Mr. DODD. I thank the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me point out that, as there are 16 million union members, a cost of $480,000 for mailing notices would be involved, which I think is a substantial amount. If first class or certified mail were used, of course, the cost would be substantially higher.

There is no evidence that the so-called big union bosses oppose the amendment. We considered the proposal quite carefully in committee. We thought, both by way of fairness and equity, it would be desirable to adopt language unanimously by Members on both sides. The language in the bill was ultimately accepted.

It seems to me that the bill as it is provides strong protection for union members. Under the bill, there must be elections for officers in national or international unions at least once every 5 years, and every 3 years in local unions. If members of unions are so out of touch with their unions that they must have their attention called to the dates of election, I am not so sure they would participate, anyway. However, I have no strong feeling on the amendment. If the Senator wants to have a voice vote on the amendment, after a quorum call, it is satisfactory with me.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I merely want to say we know that in some unions there has been a planned effort to keep members from attending a meeting at which elections will take place. That is a matter of record. If there were only one such case, it would be enough for the Senate to be concerned about it.

I think, by requiring notice, the amendment is one step, and a proper one, which would make it more difficult for anyone who has an idea of cheating members of their right to vote for their officers.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I was going to say I hope our distinguished friend from Massachusetts will accept the amendment. I would be most reluctant first to have a quorum call and then a yea and nay vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I think it would be well for all Senators to be notified prior to a vote on the amendment. I do not think the amendment should be adopted without notice to all Senators, after the committee unanimously adopted language on this subject.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think the Senator from Massachusetts may be in error. I believe I was opposed to the committee's proposal.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I recall, the Senator from Vermont was the one who originally offered the amendment. Then the amendment was reconsidered. Subsequently, in modified form, it was adopted by voice vote. I was under the impression that there was no opposition, but I am glad to correct the record.

Mr. PROUTY. It was on the second occasion that I agreed to the modification, but I do not think I did on the third occasion.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to correct the record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "4–15–59–R," and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 8, line 1, to strike out all of subsection (c) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available copies of such reports to each of its members and shall permit such members to examine the books, records, and accounts of such transactions as were or may be necessary to prepare or verify the reports required by section 101. The Secretary shall by regulation prescribe the form and manner for making such reports available to such members, and the time, place, circumstances, and conditions under which such books, records, and accounts may be examined by such members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am having distributed to my colleagues a brief outline of what the amendment would do.

I ask unanimous consent that the explanation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the explanation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNION MEMBERS' ACCESS TO BASIC RECORDS

Amendment 4–15–59–R requires the union to make copies of the reports available to each individual member and to permit the members to examine the basic records upon which the report is based. The Secretary is given the authority to issue regulations governing the time, place, etc., whereby such records may be examined by the members.

The committee bill only requires the union to make the information required to be contained in the report available to all the members of the union. But unless the union member has access to the basic books and records on which the report is based, he is not in a position to determine the truth or falsity of the report filed by the union.

The only person authorized under the bill to inspect the basic books and records is the Secretary of Labor. With literally thousands of union reports streaming in on him, the only way that he can determine the truth or falsity of these reports is to resort to a spot check of some of them.

If the membership were able to compare the basic records with the filed report, erroneous and inaccurate statements could readily be discovered and such information transmitted to the Secretary in order to enjoin a violation which has occurred or is about to occur.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, this amendment would require the union to make copies of the reports available to each of the members and permit the members to examine the basic records upon which the report is based. The Secretary would be given the authority to issue regulations governing the time, place, and so forth, whereby such records may be examined by the members.

The committee bill purports to insure honesty in union officials by requiring the union to make the report available to all the members. But does it? Let us see how this provision works out in actual practice. The union files the reports and gives copies to all its members. The member reads the report and comes across a particular statement about which he has some doubt. He goes to the union headquarters and demands to see the records upon which the report is based, in order to satisfy his doubt. The union officer refuses to let him see the basic records. Does the union violate the law? Not if the committee bill is enacted. The union officer is perfectly within his rights to refuse a member access to the basic records, according to the committee bill. Once the union made a copy of the report available to the member, it satisfied the requirement of the committee bill.

Obviously, the committee bill provision is a farce. The only person authorized under the bill to inspect the basic books and records is the Secretary of Labor. With literally thousands of union reports streaming in on him, the only way he can determine the truth or falsity of these reports is to resort to a "spot check" of some of them. This is indeed a sloppy approach, but it is the only course available to the Secretary. If the membership were able to compare the basic records with the filed report, erroneous and inaccurate statements could soon be discovered and such information transmitted to the Secretary. Unfortunately, the committee bill does not so provide, and once again a "gimmick" in the committee bill would thwart the membership in its right to full and complete knowledge concerning its union.

The only argument which has been voiced against this amendment is that it could lead to harassment of the union and its officers by malcontents and those who are interested only in overturning the incumbent leadership. This argument is specious. The amendment would give the Secretary the authority to issue regulations governing the time, place, circumstances, and conditions under which the members may inspect the basic records.

Second, why so much concern about the union and its officers? How about a little concern for the members who, incidentally, own the union? Are not their rights to be protected equally as much as those of the union? Is the whole purpose or plan of this proposed legislation to protect the union, or is it to ferret out corrupt and racketeering union bosses by enabling the members to know what is going on in their union? Should not a union member, whose right to a job may depend upon membership in a union, be given at least the same right as a stockholder of a corporation?

These questions, of course, must be answered in the affirmative.

Mr. President, I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has had a chance to read this amendment. If he has, I would appreciate having his comments on it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am strongly opposed to the amendment. The amendment was discussed in the committee.

Under the provisions of the bill presently under consideration labor unions would be required to make reports in such detail as the Secretary of Labor requested, and the Secretary of Labor would be authorized to make available to the members of the unions, in such form as he felt desirable, such information as was submitted to him. But the purpose of the amendment, as I understand it, would be to make available upon request the books and any other information which a union member might desire. Is that correct?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It would not be upon request. It would be under circumstances and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

Under my proposed amendment, the information would be made available to the union members under certain regulations. The records from which the reports were submitted to the Secretary of Labor would be made available.

It is my contention that there is no way for the union membership to know whether the reports are accurate unless the records are available. The union member must depend upon acceptance or rejection of the report by the Secretary of Labor.

If the union member had the right, as a stockholder does, to go to the books, that in itself, I think, would tend to curb the racketeering and the misuse of the money, practices about which we learned in the McClellan committee hearings.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will ask the Senator if, under his amendment, it would be compulsory for the Secretary of Labor to issue a regulation which would give these powers to the union members, or whether it would be a matter of discretion with the Secretary.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under my amendment, the word "shall" is used. The word "may" is not used; it is "shall".

Mr. KENNEDY. In other words, it would change the situation quite substantially from the provision in the bill under consideration. It would give the right to every union member to examine in detail the records, books, financial statements, checkbooks, and all the details of the union's operations, when the member willed it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under circumstances to be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor. I think the Secretary of Labor could well provide regulations which would prevent the capricious use of such a right. The regulations could be written to prevent what the Senator expresses concern about—malcontents who simply want to harass union officials.

I am not fearful that union officials will be harassed. I am fearful that reports can be made to the Secretary of Labor, and that in the course of perhaps a year the Secretary of Labor will find something wrong with them, but that it will take another period of time, possibly another year, for the Justice Department to go into the matter, and about 2 years after the horse has run down the road with a load of money on his back the barn door would be closed.

I should like to make it possible for a union member who believes something is wrong with the bookkeeping, or that something is wrong with the operations of the union, to have access to the books. Then if the union member can prove to the Secretary of Labor there is something going on in the union which should not be happening, the Secretary of Labor could step in more quickly to put a stop to it than he could under the provisions of the bill under consideration.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me ask the Senator if it is true that a shareholder of a corporation is permitted to examine the books, simply because he possesses a share of stock of a corporation.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Every union officer I know of—or, to put it another way, with whom I have come in contact—who negotiates, owns at least a share of stock in the company with which he negotiates, for the very purpose of looking at the records.

I do not think we can in this case make a direct comparison between a corporation and a union. Let us compare the union with the American Legion, or some organization for the mutual benefit of its members. That is what a union organization really is. Certainly in organizations such as that the members have access to the books at any time, and to the detail in the books.

In a corporation, one of the reasons why a stockholder does not have access in every case to the details, such as the checkbooks, et cetera, is that it would result in the giving away of corporate secrets. There is no profit-making included in the union organization, so there is no danger of giving any secrets away.

We want the member of the union to know where his money is going. The union member pays so much money a month in the form of dues and assessments. He does not expect to get anything back in the way of monetary return, but he wants to feel that the money is being used for proper purposes, and honestly. If the union member has any reason to suspect some wrongdoing, I think, since he belongs to what we call a voluntary organization, I do not agree with that terminology, but if we accept the voluntary approach, he has, or should have, the right to look at the books and records.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose this amendment very strongly. On page 8, line 1, of the bill we find the following subsection:

(c) Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available the information required to be contained in such report to all of its members in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe.

In order really to protect the interest of union members in a genuine way, the bill provides for very full reporting of all financial transactions of the union. The reports would be made to the Secretary of Labor. They would be sworn to. If information were omitted or misstated, that would constitute a crime. The Secretary must make the information available to union members in the way he thinks best to carry out the purposes of the act.

The Senator from Arizona would change all that, and provide that every union member—some of whom may be engaged in harassing activities, or may be extremely interested on behalf of employers, shall have the right to examine all the files and data of a union.

A union is not the American Legion. It is organized for the purpose of protecting the economic rights of its members. It is given special privileges and rights by the Federal Government, and certain duties are imposed upon it.

I would object to a corporation being compelled to give to every shareholder a list of all its customers and the prices it is quoting, and all the letters of information it receives on any matter in any of the books of the corporation.

This provision and the bill itself protect the rights of union members in a far more satisfactory and genuine manner than would the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. In my opinion his amendment would open up opportunities for harassment, and in some cases the disintegration of unions. In my opinion it is not intended to protect the financial rights of responsible union members.

I hope the amendment will be rejected. If necessary I shall ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment, because I think it is basic.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. I have listened to what the Senator has just said. I wonder if he is implying in his remarks that the stockholders of corporation do not have the right to examine the books of the corporation. I must admit that my own experience in this particular field is somewhat limited. I have had only one case on the subject in my life, but, as I have always understood the general rule of the law with respect to examination, the only limitation the court places upon it is that it must be reasonable—reasonable as to frequency, and reasonable as to the place and hour of such examination.

Can the Senator enlighten me on that question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not agree that there is any law—at least that I know of; certainly not the Securities and Exchange Act or any other Federal law—vesting in the shareholders of a corporation the right to examine all the financial records, books, and raw material which may enter into the preparation of such books.

Mr. ALLOTT. I referred to the books of a corporation. The way the Senator is presenting the case, it seems to me to change the law as I have always understood it. My understanding is that a stockholder does have the right to examine the books. That is the reason for the many suits which have been brought from time to time for the purpose of enforcing that right.

The only thing I wish to be sure of—and perhaps other Members of the Senate are more completely advised on this subject than either the Senator from Massachusetts or myself, and perhaps they can inform us—is that the right of examination is guaranteed. As I have always understood the law, it is the basic right of stockholders to examine the books.

Mr. KENNEDY. The amendment provides:

Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available copies of such reports to each of its members and shall permit such members to examine the books, records, and accounts of such transactions as were or may be necessary to prepare or verify the reports required by section 101.

If I were a shareholder in a corporation or a policyholder in an insurance company, I would not be permitted to examine all the books, records, and memoranda which might enter into the preparation of the profit-and-loss sheet, including discounts and other information. I do not know of any Federal law which grants such a right. I do not agree with the amendment. It seems to me that the bill itself makes available to the members in a responsible way the necessary information. Therefore, I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I point out that the language of my amendment is very clear:

Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available copies of such reports to each of its members—

Up to that point we do not disagree with the Senator from Massachusetts. The amendment goes on to say:

and shall permit such members to examine the books, records, and accounts of such transactions as were or may be necessary to prepare or verify the reports required by section 101.

Then the language prescribes what the Secretary shall do.

I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that when we are talking about a corporate body, we are talking about a body in which a person can invest or not, according to his will. When we are talking about a union, in many cases we are talking about an organization to which a man must belong in order to work.

We have two different situations. First, if a man believes that a corporation is not producing enough for the investor or doing enough for the stockholder, he can sell his shares and get out. In the case of a union, a man must belong to the union in order to work. If he withdraws from the union, in effect, he is quitting his job. He must look elsewhere for work in the town where he lives, or leave town to find employment somewhere else.

The provisions of Senate bill 1555 are fine so far as they go. The reports are made to the Secretary of Labor. They are made at the end of the fiscal year, or at such other times as he may prescribe, under regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Labor. Thousands of reports will be submitted. In the course of the following year or two the reports will be examined. As such reports are submitted by individual unions, there may be members of unions who will say to themselves, "There is something wrong about this report. I have a copy of the report sent to the Secretary of Labor. I do not think the report is right."

What can he do under the provisions of the Senator's bill? He must wait until the Secretary of Labor finds something wrong with the report—if he does—and then go through the processes of the Attorney General's office.

The only result of the enactment of my amendment would be to allow the member, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor, to examine the books. If he can say to the Secretary of Labor, "Look here, Mr. Secretary, the statement contained in this report is wrong. I have looked at the books. This is what is wrong." If he can prove it, he obtains quick access to the Secretary of Labor and to corrective action pertaining to his own union.

I cannot understand why, in a bill purporting to protect labor union members, we are unwilling to give them the right to examine the books. We are not talking about a profitmaking organization. We are not talking about an organization which has many expenses, a large staff, and operates as a corporate or business structure.

We are talking about an organization set up ostensibly to do one thing, that is, to bargain for better wages, hours, and working conditions. The man who must pay his dues in order to keep his job should have the basic right to know how his money is being spent—not from a report submitted by the head of the union to the Secretary of Labor, and subsequently to the member. If at any time during the year he suspects that there is something wrong with the report, he should be able to make application to the Secretary of Labor and have access to the books.

Mr. President, I do not care to labor the point further. The amendment is obviously needed, in view of the conditions disclosed in the McClellan committee hearings.

Mr. President, unless the Senator from Massachusetts has something further to say, I suggest the absence of a quorum in order that the amendment may be explained to a greater number of Senators than are present at the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished minority leader and myself, I submit the following unanimous-consent agreement proposal:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That, effective on the adoption of this order, during the further consideration of the bill S. 1555, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, debate on any amendment, and any amendment thereto, or motion, or appeal, except a motion to lay on the table, shall be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of any such amendment or motion and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received except those amendments now pending at the desk.

Ordered further, That on the question of the final passage of the said bill debate shall be limited to 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the majority and minority leaders: Provided, That the said leaders, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the said bill, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, motion, or appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, many Senators have withdrawn many amendments which they have had printed. We are very hopeful that votes will be taken almost each hour during the day. We plan to have the Senate remain in session until at least 11 p.m. this evening. I wish all Senators to be on notice.

An order has been entered to have the Senate convene on tomorrow at 10 a.m. We are hopeful that we shall be able to complete our action on the bill this week. Of course, if we take final action on it by Friday, we shall not hold a Saturday session. If we do not take final action on the bill by Friday, we shall have a Saturday session.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. So far as I know, at least half of the amendments have already been dealt with; and we are reasonably sure that at least half of the amendments which now are at the desk, and thus are covered by the agreement which has been entered, will not be called up. So I believe there is some likelihood that final action on the bill will be taken before Saturday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I believe that is the case.

Mr. President, I hope Senators will pay close attention, and will be prepared for yea-and-nay votes, because several yea-and-nay votes will be taken this afternoon; and it requires considerable time to prolong such votes until Senators who may have left the Chamber can return from downtown. We shall be voting on amendments both today and tomorrow.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it proposed that today's session shall last until a rather late hour tonight?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes, until 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment lettered "R" of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I wish to propose a modification of my amendment; and I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to listen to my reading of the modification. I believe the modification will be acceptable to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What time does the Senator from Arizona yield to himself?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, to my amendment which is identified as "4–15–59–R," as it is now at the desk, I would add, in line 3, after the word "members", the words "for proper cause"; and on page 2, in line 2, after the word "the", I would add the word "cause." If those modifications are made, the amendment as thus modified will then read as follows:

Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available copies of such reports to each of its members and shall permit such members for proper cause to examine the books, records, and accounts of such transactions as were or may be necessary to prepare or verify the reports required by section 101. The Secretary shall by regulation prescribe the cause, form, and manner for making such reports available to such members, and the time, place, circumstances, and conditions under which such books, records, and accounts may be examined by such members.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this modification may be made in my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the amendment is modified as requested.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, let me ask my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, whether he will accept the amendment, as modified.

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes; I accept the modified amendment. It seems to me that when the amendment, as modified, is read in conjunction with subsection 101(c), of title I, on page 8 of the bill, the amendment will be found to be in the public interest.

I express appreciation to the Senator from Arizona for adjusting his amendment, and I also express appreciation to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I believe that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of agreeing to my amendment. I ask unanimous consent that that order be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I think this is an excellent solution of the matter, because it equates the rights of the union members with the rights of corporate stockholders, and it prevents a proliferation of the inspection. I believe the amendment is acceptable, because it would prevent vexatious forays into the unions' books.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] for their help in preparing this amendment.

Again I say that if we continue in this friendly spirit, I am sure the bill will be improved hour by hour.

Mr. KENNEDY. I say to the Senator from Arizona that there is no telling what might happen. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up my amendments identified as "4–22–59–E."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed on page 54, between lines 7 and 8, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 509. Every officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, or of a trust in which such organization is interested, shall, with respect to any money or other property in his custody or possession by virtue of his position as such officer, agent, or representative, have a relationship of trust to any such labor organization and the members thereof, or to any such trust and the beneficiaries thereof, and shall be responsible in a fiduciary capacity for such money or other property, notwithstanding any grant of authority purporting to exempt him from such responsibility.

On page 54, line 8, to strike out "SEC. 509" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 510."

On page 51, between lines 11 and 12, to insert the following new subsection:

(k) "Trust in which a labor organization is interested" means a trust or other fund or organization (A) which was created or established by a labor organization, or one or more of the trustees or one or more members of the governing body of which is selected or appointed by a labor organization, and (B) a primary purpose of which is to provide benefits for the members of such labor organization or their beneficiaries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Arkansas yield to himself?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Do I now have 30 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield myself 5 minutes. I may want a little more than that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, in the course of the long series of hearings which the select committee conducted, relating to the serious misuse of funds, misappropriation of funds, looting of union treasuries, and so forth, we found in too many instances that corrupt labor officials regard a union treasury as something to be used for their own personal privilege and an opportunity to pilfer union funds almost at will. I do not believe present laws are adequate to deal with such abuses.

On page 3, subsection (c) of the bill, in one policy section, I find this language:

It is declared to be the policy of the United States to advance the objectives and protect the national interests referred to in subsection (a), and correct the evils referred to in subsection (b) by—

Then is listed (1). On page 4, as No. (2), is found the following language:

encouraging the faithful observance of fiduciary responsibilities by officers and representatives of labor organizations through a requirement—

Mr. President, this is a policy in the national interest—through a requirement that such officers and representatives shall file reports, which shall be public information, on transactions in which there may be a conflict—

And so forth. In other words, the only parts of the bill which apply directly to fiduciary responsibility are those sections of the bill in which it is required that where there is a conflict of interest the conflict of interest must be reported.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand correctly the Senator is saying that although a declaration of policy is contained in the bill, there is nothing now in the bill to implement such policy with respect to the fiduciary relationship except by the provision relating to conflict of interests?

Mr. McCLELLAN. There should be a declaration as a matter of law. The bill points in the right direction, but the bill does not travel far enough.

Mr. SCOTT. In other words, the bill contains a pious expression of wishful thinking as to what ought to be done, but the bill does not implement it. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it would implement that policy as to certain fiduciary positions.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It should be provided as a matter of law that such officers will be acting in a fiduciary capacity. That is true of officers of other institutions who act as trustees or handle money in trust, or are considered fiduciaries by reason of being officers who handle money. But in the bill a declaration of policy is made that it is in the national interest. I simply say it ought to be provided in the bill that such officers have fiduciary responsibility.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Could it not be truthfully said that this amendment is wholly for the benefit of union members?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is absolutely for the protection of union funds.

Mr. CURTIS. Which belong to the members.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; the union funds and the trustee funds.

Mr. CURTIS. And in no sense does the amendment deprive any worker of any right whatsoever, but, as a matter of fact, increases his right.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It simply imposes on the officer the responsibility which is imposed on every other officer who handles money transactions.

Mr. CURTIS. And makes him realize that the money belongs to others and that he is handling it in trust.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct. In the select committee we found many instances of violations of that trust. Probably the most flagrant instance was the Beck situation. Instead of assuming his responsibility and the obligation to handle union money as if it belonged to the union, he simply handled it for his own personal profit and gain. In other words, he pilfered nearly $400,000 of union funds, as we discovered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield myself 2 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. We uncovered a number of instances wherein union funds and profits were handled by corrupt officers, just as though they had a proprietary interest in the money.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. That situation obtained in some of the Johnny Dio unions in New York. It also was true of the operating engineers in San Francisco. In a number of cases individuals handled union money without regard to who owned the money.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. I may remind my distinguished colleague—and I say this for the information of all Senators—that the Teamsters' Union in St. Louis was bought out and paid off. The officers were, in effect, bought out, and the union was turned over to the person who is there now, Gibbons. How was that money obtained? The retirement pay money was used.

Mr. CURTIS. Or severance pay.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. The retirement or severance pay money was given to the officers who were bought out.

I do not think the union members, the working people, pay their dues in the unions for that sort of manipulation. If we establish a fiduciary responsibility under the law, I do not think union officers could perpetrate such acts.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. The matter of the fiduciary relationship underwent study in the committee. I have an amendment on the desk to deal with the subject in a somewhat broader context. I should like to develop the subject with the Senator from Arkansas, who has had a great deal of experience with the problem.

It seems to me the proposal which the Senator has made is a fine one, and I am in favor of it, but I do not think it fully meets the situation. We also have the problem of a union official who invests in a business in which his own people are employed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. JAVITS. We have a problem, perhaps, with regard to buying into a competing business. There are problems of getting money from somebody else to do a favor, for which the union member has a right to an accounting.

Even if we adopt the amendment which has been proposed, to which I have no objection, would it not be better to try, even after that, to find some formula, which I am endeavoring to work out, with which to deal with the whole fiduciary relationship, especially in terms of a remedy?

Once fiduciary responsibility is stated it will soak up all the common law, all the State law, and all the Federal law. Really, what we need in the bill, to give it teeth, as we did in the New York bill, which is a good model, is some remedy.

I ask the Senator if he does not feel that notwithstanding the adoption of the pending amendment we must go still further to try to cast a net for the whole fiduciary responsibility problem?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; I do. Frankly, I think the union member should be given a right to sue for recovery. I have another amendment along that line.

Mr. JAVITS. Perhaps the Senator from Arkansas and I can get together on this matter.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I would be happy to join with the Senator, and I would be happy to support an amendment which he may sponsor to do exactly that.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. As the Senator knows, I also have an amendment at the desk on this subject.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 2 minutes additional.

Mr. ALLOTT. I also have an amendment at the desk on this subject. I have tried to approach it from another way, by asserting what is the fiduciary responsibility. I hope, in the offering of other amendments and in the conference the Senator from Arkansas will have with the Senator from New York that I may have an opportunity to get together with the Senators, to spell out the rights we expect to retain for the union membership under the fiduciary responsibility provisions.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I would be happy to work with the distinguished Senator, and with the Senator from New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I would be happy to have the yeas and nays, unless the amendment is accepted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield me some time so that I may ask some questions?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Would I be permitted, before the request is acted upon, to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Let us wait a few minutes about the request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Very well. What was the decision? Were the yeas and nays ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have not been ordered yet.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I should like to have some clarification as to exactly what obligation the amendment seeks to put upon an officer, agent, or representative of a labor organization having a trust in money or other property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ERVIN. What obligation is there, other than the obligation to keep safely such money or property?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not think the amendment would impose any other obligation, but I will say that we have found officers who have gone to the executive board or the governing body of a union in an endeavor to manipulate authorization of this or that operation, far beyond the union purposes. In that way they have violated the fiduciary responsibilities which I think should rest upon them.

Mr. ERVIN. I was wondering whether the amendment would add anything to the obligation now resting upon such persons. A person holding the funds or property of another, of course, does owe the other persons the obligation of safely keeping the property and devoting it to the purposes which he may be authorized by the owners of such money or property to use it. Am I correct in my understanding that it is the position of the Senator from Arkansas that would be the fiduciary responsibility and duty?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think that is correct. I believe, in a sense, there is such responsibility now. What we would do is declare that to be the law.

It is indicated that is the national policy or that is in the national interest, and that those in such positions should act in a fiduciary capacity. The authors of the bill felt that much, at least, was necessary, and it was set forth in the preamble. I am now simply seeking to implement the preamble by making it a matter of law.

Mr. ERVIN. When the Kennedy-Ives bill was before the Senate last year, an amendment was offered concerning the undertaking to impose a fiduciary obligation without defining what was the fiduciary obligation. As I construe the amendment, the Senator is undertaking to define what is the nature of the fiduciary obligation by saying that the custodian of the property or the money of a union occupies the post of a trustee with respect to such money, and, if I correctly construe the language, the purpose is to make that person responsible for the safekeeping of the money and for the devotion of the money to whatever purposes may have been authorized by the union.

Mr. McCLELLAN. To the legitimate union purposes. This provision is applicable notwithstanding any grant of authority purporting to exempt such persons from such responsibility. These persons may go before the board which is appointed as the executive committee or the executive governing body, which board they control, since they have appointed the members and fixed the salaries of the president and secretary, and they may get the board to approve the use of the money for a purpose which is not legitimate union business and union service.

The purpose of the amendment is to make sure that notwithstanding any purported authority, such persons would still be acting in a fiduciary capacity and would have to meet the responsibility.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator does not construe the amendment, does he, to exempt any custodians of union funds or union property from any obligation now resting upon them?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It certainly would not. The amendment certainly intends to prohibit devices which have been used, such as having the governing body give authority to do something which is not within the purposes of the union. The amendment would retain the fiduciary responsibility irrespective of any effort to get around the law and to evade the obligation, as is now being done.

Mr. ERVIN. In other words, the objective of the Senator is to make it clear that from the standpoint of Federal law the obilgations which already rests upon such persons under State law, to safely keep and properly apply money or property in their custody, are maintained and made more clear?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think that is exactly what we are trying to do. I am sure

I need not repeat the argument for this amendment, for my colleague and I have served on the committee and have seen the many devious ways of pilfering, robbing, misusing and misappropriating and usurping power and authority. I think it is somewhat important that we take this action. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a few questions.

Suppose an officer of a union expends money for an educational purpose, to advance what he and the other officers consider to be the interests of the union. Assume that there is nothing dishonest about the expenditure. It is not an expenditure for the purpose of taking money in a back-door deal. It is an honest expenditure for educational purposes, without any impropriety. Under the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, would it be possible for a member to sue, on the argument that the educational purpose, which he does not like, is not really in keeping with the purposes of a labor organization? Could he take the case into court?

Mr. McCLELLAN. He might make such an allegation, and he might go to court. Each case must stand on its own merits. If the court found that the money was used for legitimate union purposes, for purposes which were proper under the constitution, and that it had been voted to authorize the use of money for educational purposes, I think it would come within the purview of the authority and right of the union officer. But, as my friend knows, the purpose of this amendment is to get at those who organize an executive board of their own, whose members are all in cahoots. One says to the other, "I will keep you employed at a good salary and give you a good expense allowance. You just do what I want."

That sort of thing is being done. Union treasuries are being pilfered in that way. I believe that this is a good amendment.

In the declaration of findings, purposes, and policy, at the beginning of the bill, it is said to be in the national interest to require such union officers to act in a fiduciary capacity. If that is what we mean, let us put it into law.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is somewhat different, it seems to me, from what is proposed here. Traditionally, questions of fiduciary relationships have been decided in State courts under the common law. Now it is proposed to provide a Federal remedy and a Federal rule.

I should like to know the meaning of the term "fiduciary." A labor organization has quite a different relationship with its members than does a trustee of an estate, or a director of a bank, whose sole function is to preserve the corpus. In this case we have an organization attempting to advance the economic interest of the members. Without a full realization of the purposes of the amendment, I would be reluctant to accept it, because this is an entirely new field, and I would not wish to accept the amendment unless I knew exactly what responsibilities would rest on the fiduciary. He is not a trustee in the sense I have described. We wish to make sure that he spends the money honestly. I do not wish to circumscribe what I would consider to be a legitimate function. It is proposed to add a Federal remedy, even though, as I understand the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, he would continue the State remedy.

I know that the Senator will bear with me. I wish to attempt to decide exactly what restraint the proposed amendment would place on a union officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. President, what I am attempting to do is ascertain the purpose of the amendment. Is it the purpose of the amendment to insist that union officers who expend money shall not have a conflict of interest, and that they shall not attempt, through indirect means, to pilfer a union treasury for their own benefit? If so, in my opinion it would be a proper amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is exactly what I am trying to do. I have not had the opportunity to study the question as thoroughly as the Senator has done during the course of the hearings. However, I know that there have been flagrant and repeated abuses in this area.

Inasmuch as in the declaration of findings, purposes, and policy, it is stated that it is in the national interest for union officers to act in a fiduciary capacity and faithfully observe all fiduciary responsibilities, I thought we should spell it out in the law, and say that they are bound to do so.

Mr. KENNEDY. I repeat that the reason why I raise this question is that anyone who studies State statutes, or the decisions of State courts, will realize that there is a well developed body of law in the States defining the term "fiduciary." In addition, the bill prohibits conflict of interest, and places very severe restraints on an officer who may undertake to rob a union treasury. Now, in addition to the State remedy, it is proposed to provide a Federal remedy, without any previous decisions in this area, and without any statute.

Therefore I think it is most important that the Senator make clear exactly what the amendment means. The amendment may be agreed to.

We both agree that a union officer does not have the same function as the trustee of an estate, or the director of a bank, except that both are required to deal honestly with the funds in their possession. I am concerned lest we place a restraint on the purposes for which money may be properly and honestly spent, in our attempt to safeguard union funds.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not believe we are proposing to do that. It is not my purpose to do that.

A union may wish to conduct an educational program. I am not opposed to such programs. I think a union should have the right to conduct educational programs. I never wish to deny to a union the right to participate in the affairs of society and of our country.

It is possible that at times the right may be abused, but I defend the right of a union, a corporation, or any other institution, to discuss any proper subject, from the standpoint of education, from the standpoint of enlightenment, or from the standpoint of conveying its views on any public issue. I believe in that right. I would never take it away. I am not striving to do anything of the kind. I am merely seeking to firm up and nail down the fiduciary responsibilities which I believe union officers should have in the financial field.

Mr. ERVIN and Mr. CARROLL rose.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield first to the Senator from North Carolina, and then to the Senator from Colorado.

First, I remind the Senator from North Carolina that last year he objected vigorously to imposing a Federal fiduciary relationship on union officers. Upon that occasion he said:

> Mr. President, I have two fundamental objections to the amendment. The first is that it would have a tendency to complicate simplicity. The amendment undertakes to impose by Federal law a trust obligation or a fiduciary obligation upon union officers who handle money. Such obligations are now imposed upon such officers by State laws.
> So the first fundamental trouble with the amendment is that it undertakes to impose upon union officers who handle these funds a Federal trust relationship or a Federal fiduciary relationship to the union members; but nowhere does the amendment define what the consequences of such a relationship are under Federal law; and I know of no Federal statute which defines the obligations which rest upon a fiduciary or upon a trustee. Therefore, we would have the creation of a Federal right without a definition of the responsibilities which would go with that right; and that would introduce into the law confusion, rather than protection, in my judgment.

I ask the Senator from North Carolina what his feeling is this year, and in what way the language of the pending amendment may differ from the language of the amendment offered last year.

Mr. ERVIN. As I recall, the language of last year's amendment was entirely general. It provided a fiduciary obligation without undertaking to express in any way what the fiduciary relationship was. As the Senator from Massachusetts well says, there are many fiduciaries under State laws, such as executors, administrators, trustees, and others whose duties are defined by State law.

I think there is a distinction between this amendment and the amendment offered last year.

The Senator says, in effect, that a union officer owes a duty of trust in respect to the money or property of the union in his hands. According to my interpretation—and the Senator from Arkansas says he agrees with that interpretation—that would impose upon the union officer the obligation as a trustee to safeguard the particular money or property which is committed to him, and would also impose upon him the obligation not to dispose of the property or to expend the money for anything except legitimate union purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. When the Senator uses the term "safeguard" he does not mean that it is comparable to safeguarding the corpus of capital, but rather he means that the money must be expended in such a way as to safeguard the interest of the union, in accordance with the way the members of the union may decide the money should be expended.

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct. In other words, I could put it this way. We are under an obligation to see that the money is safely kept, to the end that it may be applied to duly authorized and legitimate union purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand, the Senator from Arkansas holds that view also.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct. If the Senator has any thought that I am trying to interfere with COPE, that is not correct. There may be amendments directed to that point, and to deal with that direct question. However, I am not offering my amendment on the direct question of political contributions. Everyone knows my views on that subject, I assume. This is not a drive at that situation. It is a drive at the skulduggery of some leaders when they meet in executive session and pay off this one and pay off that one.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. As I understand the provision in his amendment, it refers not to the membership voting to do that which is legitimate so far as union business is concerned, but, rather, to prevent the membership from voting at a meeting, with only a few of the members present, to give excessive payments to a union officer for illegitimate purposes. It is to prevent the misuse of union funds by a majority at a meeting when that majority represents only a very small minority of the membership, and to prevent action which could perhaps involve the enrichment of certain union officers by a surreptitious deal.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is, generally, the object of the amendment. I cannot think of every purpose, and I do not know that anyone else can.

Mr. KENNEDY. We are attempting to arrive at some guide points on this subject.

Mr. ERVIN. So far as my personal experience is concerned, I believe this matter is already covered by law in all the States. I do not share the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas that it is essential to do what he suggests we do. However, I do not see that the provision will do any harm to the bill. I would suggest to the Senator that, in line 6 on page 2, he modify his amendment by striking out "grant and authority" and insert in lieu thereof "exculpatory clause or action."

Mr. McCLELLAN. What is the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. ERVIN. The suggestion is that the Senator insert, instead, the words "exculpatory clause or action."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I agree with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas had no idea of taking away the rights of members of a union for democratic action such as the right of members to give a grant of authority. As I understand it, the whole purpose of the proposed legislation is to ensure members the right to vote and the right to dictate the policy of the union. I believe the amendment should be accepted. It is very important to establish the fiduciary relationship in this field.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say that there never was any idea of my trying to curb the authority of the members of a union to do whatever the members want to do; rather, it is my intention to protect the members from having the members of a board or a committee vote to do just about anything they want to do, as has been the case in many instances.

Mr. CARROLL. I believe this discussion clarifies that point.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am willing to accept the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina with repect to modifying my amendment.

Mr. President, I modify my amendment on page 2, line 6, by striking out the words "grant of authority", and inserting in lieu thereof the words "exculpatory clause or action."

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, may I ask a question of either the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENNEDY. I believe I should continue to yield to the Senator from Colorado. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if anywhere in the bill—not in the proposed amendment, but in the bill—we have clearly defined the fiduciary obligations of an officer or an agent of a union?

Mr. KENNEDY. No; we have not.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What was the question of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CARROLL. I asked the Senator from Massachusetts whether in the bill we define the fiduciary obligation of a union official. My reason for asking the question is that I have in mind what has been done in the State of New York. I have in my hand a memorandum of an act passed by the New York State Legislature, dated March 13, 1959. It deals with an attempt to meet the same problem. I will read a portion of it:

> Responsible leaders of the labor movement have recognized that union officers and agents have a fiduciary duty to serve the members of the union honestly and faithfully, and these leaders have taken courageous action against those who have violated their trust. Experience, however, has shown that labor's efforts to correct abuses from within need to be aided and supplemented by legislation.

In the New York act there are these sections among others: Section 721, covers definitions; section 722 deals with fiduciary obligations of officers and agents; section 723 is entitled "Specific Prohibited Financial Interests and Transactions"; section 724, "Obligation of Employers and Others"; section 728, "Enforcement of Financial Reporting and Accounting Duty."

That is a comprehensive treatment of the subject in the New York act.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would say that in a different form we have it also in the pending bill, in my opinion.

Mr. CARROLL. As I follow the intelligent discussion of the Senator from Massachusetts we are establishing a new Federal right. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. A new right with respect to union officers.

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. So far as fiduciary relationships are concerned. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. I am not speaking against the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, because I will vote for it, and I believe it is a good amendment, but I would like us to make a good legislative record and to establish our legislative intent. Does the Senator not believe we should give a fuller treatment in the bill to this subject, so that we will be understood and so that we will set up definite standards in the bill?

Mr. McCLELLAN. My understanding is that a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare proposes to work out something along that line. The Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has announced that he wishes to do it. Others will consult with him, and wish to colloborate with him in that regard.

Mr. CARROLL. I have borrowed a copy of the New York act from the Senator from New York. I understand he wishes to speak on the subject. This is a fine piece of legislation which the State of New York has passed. It would not be amiss for us to follow along the same line.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have no objection. In fact, I believe I would be enthusiastically for it, if we can word the bill properly.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am about ready to yield back the remainder of my time. I should like to know if I have an accurate understanding of what the Senator from Arkansas proposes. If it is to give the members of a labor union a new Federal right with respect to their officers, that is one thing. However, if the proposal is the first in a series of proposals setting up elaborate strictures with regard to fiduciary relationships, I should like to look at it further before action is taken on it.

If other language is to be proposed concerning fiduciaries, I think all the language should be considered together, so that we may see where we are going and know where we will arrive, before we set out on the journey. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas will agree with me as to that.

I would be prepared to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas as it is worded, and that would settle the matter. But if we are to begin the consideration of a series of other amendments—I do not think the Senator from Arkansas has any such, but I understand other Senators have—I believe we should take a look at the whole package.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Are there not State laws at present which cover the situation in every instance? If State legislation exists, what is the need for Federal legislation?

Mr. KENNEDY. In my opinion, the State laws, as the Senator from North Dakota said last year, are adequate.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I completely approve the position just taken by the Senator from Massachusetts on one point. If other suggestions are to be made in this field, under the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are now acting, I believe that such action should be taken during the consideration of the modification of this amendment. There may be some other amendments which relate to the trust relationship, but I have not seen any. If the Senator from Arkansas has printed and lying at the desk the only amendment which deals with this field, certainly, it seems to me, it would be wise to withhold final action on the amendment until the Senator from New York or any other Senator who wishes to propose modifications or suggestions shall have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that I may be yielded 10 minutes on the bill; then I shall yield 5 minutes of that time to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I will yield 5 minutes of my time to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Arkansas. Instead of yielding time on the bill, I yield 5 minutes on the amendment to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Perhaps we can resolve this problem. Three questions are involved. One is money. That matter the Senator from Arkansas has covered very well, I think.

The second is the fiduciary relationship established when an investment is made by a union organizer, let us say, in a business in which a union employs him and he makes money out of it.

The third is where he gets something surreptitiously. He may get a bribe or something else. The Senator has covered that. Those are our suggestions. It could be said, I believe, that they are all covered by existing law in one place or another.

But I am satisfied that to create a Federal statute, such as the Senator desires, with respect to money relationship, will still leave the question of the remedy open. The question is, Do we want to leave the question of the remedy open to any suit aside from a Federal court suit which might lie by reason of diversity of citizenship or any other ground outside the statute? Or do we want to have a section of the bill which concerns itself with the right to sue, and to provide in that section a right to the individual member to sue when the union itself does not act, given a decent period of time?

I am laying the matter on the table, so that we can discuss it and determine whether it needs to be included in the bill in order to make airtight the question of fiduciary responsibility and the recourse.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I have at the desk, and propose to offer, an amendment which is designated 4–20–59–0, dealing with the right to bring suits. As now drafted, it reads:

> The Secretary, or any member or members of a labor organization acting on their own behalf, or on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated, or on behalf of the organization, may maintain an action or proceeding in a district court of the United States * * * to obtain * * * an accounting for, and restitution to, such labor organization.

Mr. JAVITS. I have a similar amendment at the desk. We may be able to deal with the whole matter now. My amendment relates to section 109(b), page 21. It gives the right to sue to recover the proceeds of any embezzlement or the like. I had proposed to include, in a very brief way, the right of the individual to sue where a fiduciary responsibility—which is the word of art used in the preamble of the bill, and perhaps it is just as well to use the same word of art—had been violated. If we place the language at that particular point, we will have a complete practice set up which will require an ex parte application before suit can be started at any place.

I would be perfectly willing to agree to the proposal made by the Senator from Massachusetts that we accept the provision which the Senator has suggested to cover all the questions of fiduciary relationship except the question of remedy. I should like to reserve that one point, so that we may use the same plan for it, whether it be that of the Senator from Arkansas or mine or some other Senator's, so long as it deals with the question of remedy, and only that.

But as to the substantial question as to what shall be a breach of fiduciary relation, I am satisfied, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, to accept the proposal made with respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As I have said earlier, we can try to devise something with respect to remedy, but I feel that in this instance we are dealing with internal corruption. We cannot go too far in making the law positive that we mean that those concerned shall be responsible for the money and shall account for it.

Mr. JAVITS. I certainly agree with the Senator. I made that exception. I think the Senator is correct in saying that we should settle the question here and now; but I think we should reserve the one item with respect to remedy.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the 5 minutes has not been used up, I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. I agree substantially with the Senator from New York. As to the first part, so far as I am concerned, I would be happy with the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. But I remind the Senator from New York, and also other Senators, that there is one phase of funds which is not covered and which has been specifically exempted—the welfare and pension funds. In my own amendment, which I feel compelled to offer as an amendment, I have covered the field of welfare and pension funds, as well as union funds, because, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], who is in the Chamber, well knows, we found that not merely a few dollars, but in some circumstances millions of dollars, were stolen from those funds. The provision should apply also to officers who embezzle such funds.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I believe my amendment does cover welfare funds. It covers trust funds in which a union may be interested. I define a trust in which a labor organization is interested as follows:

> (A) Which was created or established by a labor organization, or one or more of the trustees or one or more members of the governing body of which is selected or appointed by a labor organization, and (B) a primary purpose of which is to provide benefits for the members of such labor organization or their beneficiaries.

It seems to me that that covers both pension and welfare funds.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to study the Senator's amendment further.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I wish to clear up one point as to which the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] raised a question I do not remember hearing the situation made clear.

The Senator from North Dakota asked this, in effect: if State laws exist in this field, are they not adequate? The advice given by lawyers to me is that while they feel State laws are adequate, they are not specific. State laws are complete so far as nonprofit corporations and profit corporations are concerned, but they do not deal specifically with labor or union organizations.

So it is felt by those of us who have advocated fiduciary responsibility in such cases, that unless it is spelled out in the law, the law will not require it.

At present there is no law, either Federal or State, which covers fiduciary responsibility of this sort; I wish to stress that point.

In connection with this matter, it has repeatedly been argued by the author of the bill that such a provision would deal with an area which already is covered by State law. I may point out that section 109(a) of the bill deals with an area which already is completely covered by State law; namely, embezzlement. Every State has on its books a law against embezzlement; that has been the case since the very beginning of the State laws. Yet this bill, in section 109(a) now contains a definite provision bearing on embezzlement and the punishment for embezzlement. So it is obvious that the bill as it now stands definitely does deal with matters which already are dealt with by State law.

In this connection with this matter, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a definition of fiduciary which has been furnished to me by the Library of Congress.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFINITION OF FIDUCIARY

A fiduciary is a person whose relation to another is such that he is under a duty to act for the benefit of the other, as to matters within the scope of the relation. (Restatement of law trusts.)

"The term 'fiduciary' involves the idea of trust, confidence. It refers to the integrity—the fidelity—of the party trusted rather than his credit or ability. It contemplates good faith, rather than legal obligation, as the basis of the transaction." (Stoll v. King, N.Y. 8, How. Proc. 299.)

"Partners occupy toward each other, as to the partnership business, a fiduciary relation." (Bouvier.)

"Money is received in a fiduciary capacity when it does not become the absolute property of the one receiving it, but is received for a particular purpose, in which other persons than the one receiving it are interested." (265 F. 343.)

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Sometimes an enemy of an organization will bring one lawsuit after another against it, in order to attempt to ruin it. I would not wish to be party to a provision which would enable such a situation to develop—one in which one lawsuit after another could be brought against such an organization, with resultant great expense to it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Of course, today the situation is that virtually all groups, except labor organizations, require fiduciary responsibility on the part of their officials. The minister of the church which my friend, the Senator from North Dakota, attends is required by State law to have fiduciary responsibility—as is true in the case of all other nonprofit organizations. Yet the leaders of labor organizations are not required to have similar fiduciary responsibility.

Likewise, the president of the Red Cross, the president of the YMCA, and the president of the YWCA are required to have fiduciary responsibility, as spelled out in the State laws which relate to nonprofit organizations. On the other hand, a union leader is not required to have such fiduciary responsibility.

We propose this amendment only in order to provide some relief in that situation, because I know of no existing law which makes possible the recovery of funds which are improperly taken from a labor organization by one of its leaders. For instance, the vast sums of money which Dave Beck took from his union can never be recovered by law, according to my understanding.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. I have examined the Senator's amendment. It covers adequately, I believe, the point I raised a moment ago in regard to pension and welfare funds. Under section 302(c) of the Taft-Hartley Act there have been many abuses; and, as a result, many of the beneficiaries have not been able to obtain pensions.

I think the language now proposed will help protect the beneficiaries of those funds.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may suggest the absence of a quorum, and that the time required for the quorum call shall not be charged to the time available to either side under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield me time out of his time?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to inquire if the clerk at the desk has inserted the language that I asked unanimous consent be inserted as a modification of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification has been made.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As a further parliamentary inquiry, I should like to check on the language. Have the following words been inserted after the word "any" on line 6, page 2: "exculpatory clause or action"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That language has been inserted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If it is satisfactory, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe my time has expired. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate on the amendment has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as modified.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as modified. (Putting the question.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. What was the ruling on the request for the yeas and nays?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was not a sufficient number to second the request.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the vote been taken?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote has been taken, and the amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there was a discussion a moment ago. There was a request for the yeas and nays. It was withdrawn temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays were requested.

Mr. CURTIS. By the distinguished Senator from Delaware, and he withheld that request temporarily. It was my understanding we were going to have the yeas and nays on the McClellan amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be possible to have a reconsideration of that vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. What was the vote on the amendment? How many "yeas" were there, and how many "nays" were there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Were there any "nays"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear any.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, Mr. President, does the record as it stands indicate that the amendment was agreed to unanimously? There were no "nays"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record will show that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. And that there were no "nay" votes. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record does not show any number voting on either side.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the record show that anyone voted against the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record simply shows that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, what I am asking is this: The Presiding Officer called for the "noes." Did any Senator respond, voting "no"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair heard no response.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well, Mr. President. I withdraw my request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Do I correctly understand that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas has been agreed to by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Senator from Arkansas is correct.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I should like to have the RECORD show that I am present and that I voted "aye."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, for myself, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], I call up the amendment which is at the clerk's desk, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 21, lines 14 through 25, and page 22, lines 1 through 16, it is proposed to strike out all of subsection (b) of section 109 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) When any officer or employee of any labor organization is alleged to have embezzled, stolen, or unlawfully and willfully abstracted or converted to his own use or the use of another any money or property of the labor organization, and the labor organization or its governing board or officers refuse or fail to sue to recover such money or property or the value of the same or for other appropriate relief within four calendar months after being requested to do so by any member of the labor organization, any member of the labor organization may sue such officer, representative, or employee in any district court of the United States or in any State court of competent jurisdiction to recover such money or property or the value thereof or for other appropriate relief, for the benefit of the labor organization. No such proceeding shall be brought except upon leave of the court obtained upon verified application and for good cause shown, which application may be made ex parte. The trial judge may allot a reasonable part of the recovery in any action under this subsection to pay the fees of counsel prosecuting the suit at the instance of the member of the labor organization and to compensate such member for any expenses necessarily paid or incurred by him in connection with the litigation. Nothing in this subsection shall reduce or limit the responsibilities of any officer, or employee of a labor organization under any other law of the United States or the law of any State, and nothing in this subsection shall take away any right or bar any remedy to which members of a labor organization are entitled under any such law.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What was the reference to the lines in the bill?

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Page 21, lines 14 through 25, and page 22, lines 1 through 16.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the clerk very much.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am very honored to be allowed by my distinguished colleagues to present this amendment on behalf of all of us who are interested in this subject. It is truly a collaborative effort.

Mr. President, the objective of the amendment is to give the individual union member a right to sue for a breach of the trust relation which was established by the McClellan amendment, and also to give the union member a right to sue for the breach of any other trust or fiduciary relation which now comes within the broad words of the amendment, the words being—

When any officer or employee of any labor organization is alleged to have embezzled, stolen, or unlawfully and willfully abstracted or converted—

These are all words of art and, we believe, very broad in their coverage as to the relationships which we discussed in connection with the McClellan amendment. They fall into three categories.

There is a trust relation for money specified in the McClellan amendment, now a part of the bill, and I think quite properly so.

There is the relationship of a breach of trust where a union officer might have an investment or some other financial activity which is against the interests he is elected and authorized to represent.

Finally there is reference to the moneys improperly received, whether bribes or otherwise.

The trust relation being set up, and the fiduciary relation being referred to in the purpose of this bill, the provision which is now submitted and which is before the Senate by way of an amendment seeks to give a remedy. What is the remedy? The remedy provides that when any member complains to the labor organization about this matter, pretty much the same as any stockholder in a corporation, and waits a reasonable time, which we fix in the bill at 4 months—I will give the reason for the time period in a minute—and the union itself does not do anything about the matter, then the member may go into court and ask for leave to sue in what we lawyers call an ex parte proceeding, which can be done within a year. If the member is given leave to sue—in other words, if he shows he has complied with the statute and shows some probable cause—he may sue, and if he recovers, the court may allocate to his lawyers and to him a part of the recovery by way of expenses. This is the traditional technique pursued in stockholder suits, and the amendment would extend the same rights and opportunities to the union members.

Mr. President, the time period is 4 months, to which I referred, and represents a reduction from the time period which is now in the bill. As the bill now reads, it relates only to money which is embezzled or stolen, where the officer has been convicted of embezzling or stealing it. This amendment would very greatly broaden that provision.

As the bill now reads, there is a provision for a 6 months' waiting period. I thought that was much too long, and I proposed 3 months. We are persuaded that the 4 months' provision is fair, because some of the union boards meet every quarter, and if we assume the major time lapse to be involved we ought to give an opportunity for the board to meet and for the member to decide whether to sue or not to sue.

Mr. President, I think this is an eminently proper and needed amendment. It is a matter about which I urged action in the committee.

As I said when I began, I am honored that my colleagues have entrusted me with the responsibility of presenting the amendment before the Senate. I hope it will be adopted as part of the package we have been discussing with the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN rose.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I wish to say to the distinguished Senator from New York that I am very happy to be associated with him as a cosponsor of the amendment. Considering the changes which have been made in the language of the original bill, with the fiduciary section which we have adopted as an amendment to the bill, I think the bill now actually will afford some real protection, and will give a remedy which will improve the fiduciary relations of some people who, I know, have in the past abused those relations.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, since this amendment is well drawn, I accept it, because I believe it provides for an effective right to enforce the fiduciary remedies which we have made available in a previous amendment. I hope the Senate will accept the amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time if the Senator from Massachusetts is prepared to yield back the remainder of his time on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] for himself and other Senators.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 30, before the period at the end of line 23, it is proposed to insert, after the word "organization", the following:

; (E) a full and complete account of the financial condition of such subordinate organization as of the time trusteeship was assumed over it and as of not more than 30 days prior to the making of such report, which account shall include a detailed statement of any funds transferred to such national or international labor organization or to any other labor organization from such subordinate organization.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, this provision is taken from an amendment which I had proposed to offer, which has been printed and lies on the desk.

I have discussed this amendment with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and we believe the amendment would give added protection, and require proper reporting with respect to trusteeship. It fills a gap which I am sure was an oversight at the time this provision in the bill was drafted.

I am sure there can be no objection to the amendment. It is in line with what we all have in mind, to preserve integrity in the financial affairs of unions. I trust the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts will accept it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe this amendment would serve the purpose of clarifying and strengthening the trusteeship provision. I am delighted to accept it.

I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] and myself, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated. It is designated "4-21-59-F."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. Does the Senator wish the amendment read?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 25, line 21, and extending to page 26, through line 3, it is proposed to delete subdivision (3).

On page 30, between lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 113. (a) It shall be unlawful to carry on picketing on or about the premises of any employer for the purpose of, or as part of any conspiracy or in furtherance of any plan or purpose for, the personal profit or enrichment of any individual (except a bona fide increase in wages or other employee benefits) by taking or obtaining any money or other thing of value from such employer against his will or with his consent.

(b) Any person who willfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a felony and be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment for not more than twenty years or both.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Under the provisions of the Kennedy-Ervin bill last year we provided that anyone who engaged in picketing for the purpose of a shakedown should be guilty of an unfair labor practice. That was an additional remedy, to be available in addition to the Hobbs Act.

There has always been some question as to whether the Hobbs Act applied to cases in which violence did not take place. In addition, this provision provided a quicker remedy. It provided for compulsory immediate injunction, while the criminal prosecution might be going on.

There was some objection to making this practice an unfair labor practice, and a felony rather than a misdemeanor. The Department of Justice raised the question 3 or 4 days ago as to whether this provision might not raise some question as to the sanctions available under the Hobbs Act. Therefore, in order to make sure that there is no choice of sanctions, as between those which might be misdemeanors and those which might be felonies, the amendment is now rewritten, so that the sanctions against using a picket line for the purposes of extorting money are now identical with those under the Hobbs Act.

This provision would not weaken or change the Hobbs Act. It would merely provide that when there is any question as to whether the Hobbs Act applies in cases in which violence does not occur—as in the case of shakedown picketing—adequate sanctions are provided. This language is in accordance with the views of the Department of Justice.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 3 or 4 minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I have an amendment dealing with this section of the bill, which would be a substitute for the pending amendment after its adoption, plus a substitute for other provisions in the bill. It goes further and deals with recognitional picketing, and also organizational picketing, which are not included in the pending amendment.

I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Will I still be able to offer an amendment to this section dealing with organizational and recognitional picketing, notwithstanding the adoption of the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of any part untouched by the pending amendment would be in order; or a substitute for the entire section would be in order.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I fully agree with the objectives of the pending amendment, and believe it should be adopted, if this provision is to remain in the bill. I am happy to cosponsor it. But I do not wish to preclude myself from offering amendments which go further and deal with organizational picketing and recognitional picketing. If I am not precluded from doing that, I sincerely wish to have the pending amendment agreed to. I submit that as a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such an amendment would be in order.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Chair. I hope the pending amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Arkansas if he would be willing to insert, in line 5 of his amendment, after the words "carry on," the words "or threaten to carry on," so as to read:

It shall be unlawful to carry on or threaten to carry on picketing on or about the premises of any employer—

And so forth. I suggest that change for the reason that many examples have been cited before the McClellan committee to show that the mere threat of picketing can often achieve what picketing is designed to accomplish.

Mr. KENNEDY. The only reason why I should like to take a very careful look at the proposal is that the penalty is exceptionally heavy. It is a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both. Therefore I should like to have a little time to analyze what is meant by the word "threaten."

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree that the penalty is severe. However, the same result we are talking about could be achieved by a threat. Of course, the full penalty would not have to be applied in each case. I would hope that the Senator would accept the amendment, because it would eliminate the threat.

Mr. KENNEDY. This is really the first time I have had an opportunity to look at the proposed language. I am not sure that I would object to it after it was analyzed. I am not prepared to say that we could accept the language and attach it to a statute which carries such jeopardy, particularly when the word "threaten" is an extremely vague one. If a man receives money, of course, he would be subject to the provisions of the act anyway, if the employer paid him off. I believe the language is too vague to apply here. Perhaps there is another place in the bill where the Senator could suggest it be added. Perhaps it could be added to another section of the bill after we have had an analysis of what the word "threaten" means.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is not of such urgency that I would insist on the amendment being made now, or added to this part of the bill. However, I do believe that a person can be threatened with picketing, and the result could be the same as the actual illegal picketing.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Would it be in order for the Senator from Arizona at a later time to offer the amendment to the section we are discussing, by adding a sentence to it? It would amount to inserting language on page 1, line 5. It would involve the addition of further language, not the striking out of any language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It could be done provided the language were germane.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will think it over. It may be possible to add the language to another part of the bill. It could possibly be taken care of with another picketing amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, on behalf of himself and the Senator from Arkansas.

Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment, identified as 4–17–59–E.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 35, line 12, it is proposed to strike out "its constitution and bylaws" and insert in lieu thereof "this section, and with its constitution and bylaws to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this section".

On page 35, line 18, strike out "its constitution and bylaws" and insert in lieu thereof "this section, and with its constitution and bylaws to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this section".

On page 36, lines 11 and 12, strike out "the labor organization's constitution and bylaws" and insert in lieu thereof "this section, and with the labor organization's constitution and bylaws to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this section".

Beginning with line 13 on page 36, strike out over through line 16 on page 37 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(d)(1) Candidates in any election required by this section to be held by secret ballot shall be selected as provided in this paragraph. There shall be mailed to each member of the labor organization at his last known home address a primary ballot containing a list of the offices to be filled. Each such member shall be entitled to place on such primary ballot the name of the person of his choice for each such office and to return such ballot by mail within a reasonable specified time to a counting officer designated by the labor organization as provided in paragraph (4). The counting officer shall tabulate and certify the results of the balloting to the labor organization and to the two persons receiving the highest number of votes for each office. The two persons receiving the highest number of votes for any office to be filled shall be the candidates for such office.

(2) An election required by this section to be held by secret ballot shall be conducted as provided in this paragraph. There shall be mailed to each member of the labor organization at his last known home address an election ballot containing a list of the offices to be filled and the names of the candidates selected as provided in paragraph (1) for each such office. Each such member shall be entitled to indicate on such ballot his preference for one of the two candidates for each such office and to return such ballot within a reasonable specified time by mail to a counting officer designated by the labor organization as provided in paragraph (4). The counting officer shall proceed to tabulate the votes and certify the results to the labor organization and to each candidate. The candidate receiving the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to have been elected to such office.

(3) The ballots required to be mailed under paragraph (1) or paragraph (2) shall be accompanied by appropriately addressed return envelopes so designed that the name of the member casting the ballot will appear on the outer envelope in order that it may be checked against the membership list of the labor organization for the purpose of verifying the eligibility of the voter. Such ballots shall be received and handled by the counting officer in such manner as will preserve the secrecy of the ballot. All ballots cast shall be preserved by the counting officer for a period of ninety days during which such counting officer shall permit their inspection, in his presence, by the two persons receiving the highest number of votes for any office in the case of an election held for the purpose of nominating candidates, or by a candidate in any other election, or by the duly authorized representative of any such person or candidate.

(4) The Secretary shall establish and publish a list of qualified individuals who are available to act as counting officers for the purpose of this paragraph. In establishing such list, the Secretary shall insofar as possible include the names of persons from each geographical area in which elections subject to this subsection may be held. No person shall be designated by a labor organization as a counting officer unless his name appears on such list, or if he is an officer, employee, or member of such organization or an employer any of whose employees are members of such organization. The Secretary shall formulate and publish a schedule of fees to be paid by labor organizations to such counting officers.

(5) Any person who, except as authorized by this subsection, opens or examines any ballot mailed by a member of a labor organization in an election to which this section applies, or who folds, tears, or places any mark on any ballot to be used in any such election for the purpose of learning or attempting to learn or making it possible for any other person to learn or attempt to learn the identity of the person casting such ballot, or who, having knowledge of the identity of a member of a labor organization casting any such ballot, discloses to any other person, without the consent of such member, any information obtained from such ballot, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, after discussing the amendment, it is my intention to withdraw it and to offer it at a later time. I seek the time on this occasion to discuss it for the record and for the benefit of the Senators present.

The amendment deals with the election of union officers. It is being offered at the suggestion given to me by union members. During the many months in which I have sat on the select committee I have heard the tales of many offenses—embezzlement, racketeering, boycotting, and a long list of other unlawful acts. However, that testimony has not shaken my faith in the honesty and integrity of the working force of America. The men and women who toil are individuals of character and responsibility.

It is my firm belief that if the real power in a union is vested in the rank and file of its members, that accomplishment alone will eliminate a great portion of all the abuses and misuse of funds and misuse of power and the other offenses which all of us must frown on.

Mr. President, in legislating on the question of how a union should elect its officers, we must keep in mind that a union is not a voluntary association in the ordinary sense of the word. If a group of people in the United States wishes to form an organization, we like to grant to them all the liberty possible so that they may organize and provide for the conduct of their own affairs. However, for the majority of the workers in the country, union membership is the right to make a living. The law of the land sanctions a contract which provides that a man must stay in the union and pay his dues, or lose his job. So long as we permit that situation to prevail, the public does have an interest in how that union operates. It is the responsibility of the Government to see to it that the members who do the work and pay the dues and live under the contract are in real control of their union. My amendment, which is printed in the RECORD, provides for a secret ballot by mail. It provides for an absolute open primary conducted by mail. It also provides for an election conducted by mail.

It would make it possible for the union member to vote in the privacy of his home for the union officers of his choice. His ballot would be mailed through the U.S. mails. It would be a secret ballot. There would be no chance for the union member to be intimidated or threatened. There would be no chance of coercion or of any interference from the top. It would place in the rank and file of the union members the power to control their own unions. The mechanics of the proposal are these:

First, it does not call for Government-supervised elections. An election would be held in this manner: The Secretary of Labor would publish a list of acceptable or approved counting officers. There would be a list for each city or other geographical area. That list would be made available to all unions. The counting officer might be the Honest Ballot Association. It might be a distinguished clergyman, or an accountant, or someone else. The Secretary of Labor would publish in each area a list of acceptable counting officers.

Then, as the time approached for the election of officers in a union, the labor organization could select any one of the approved counting officers whom they chose. They would have to pay fees according to a schedule published by the Secretary. But the union itself would pick, from a list of many names submitted by the Secretary, the counting officer of their choice to conduct the election.

That counting officer would then mail out a primary ballot. On the primary ballot would be a list of all the offices to be filled. The list might include the offices of president, vice president, secretary, and so on down the list. The ballot would contain merely a list of the offices to be filled. It would be transmitted through the mails to the residence addresses of the union members. In the privacy of his own home, each union member would write on the ballot his choice for each office. He would write the name of the individual whom he wanted to be the president of the union.

There would be furnished to the union member two envelopes. He would enclose his ballot within the smaller envelope, and that envelope would be sealed. Then he would put the sealed envelope in a larger envelope, which would bear his return address, so that the counting official could check to see whether he was a member of the union. Then the envelope would be mailed to the counting office.

The counting officer would open the ballots and count them, and the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes for each office would become the nominees. That would constitute the primary election.

Then the counting officer at the stated time would again mail out ballots to the members of the union. Those ballots would contain the names of the two nominees for each office to be filled. Again, the ballots would be transmitted through the U.S. mails. When a member received his ballot, he would vote his choices in private and return the ballot in a manner which provided sanctity, under the protection of the U.S. mails. When the neutral, approved counting officer received the ballots, he would count them. Whoever received the most votes would be declared elected.

My amendment provides that the counting officers must so conduct all of their activities as to maintain absolutely the secrecy of the ballot, both in the nominating process and in the electing process. The amendment provides a penalty for the violation of that trust. It provides a penalty for tearing or otherwise marking any ballot in such a way that it cannot be identified.

Although it is brief, I believe, my amendment contains all the safeguards which are needed. It provides that the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes, or any candidate or representative, can, in the presence of the counting officer, inspect the ballots. The counting officer must preserve the ballots for a period of 90 days.

Mr. President, what is wrong with such a procedure? Why should not the individual who is compelled to belong to a labor organization in order to earn his livelihood and support his family have not only a right to have a voice in the nomination of candidates for office in his union, but also a right to vote for them?

I can say without fear of being challenged that the unions in which corruption and wrongdoing were found by the McClellan committee were invariably unions run from the top. If that procedure can be discontinued, and if the workers of America can be given the real power to control their unions, corruption, except in rare instances, will come to an end. There will be no chance for a racketeer, an ex-convict, a Communist, an embezzler, or a taker of the fifth amendment, to perpetuate himself in office. I have too much confidence in the workers of America to believe that anything like that would happen.

Mail to the members of a union ballots on which they can nominate their candidates for the offices to be filled, and can do so in secrecy, with the assurance that the ballots will be counted honestly; and then mail to them another ballot containing the names of those who won in the primary election, and again permit them to vote in secrecy and to have their ballots counted honestly, and we will not only put an end to the malpractices and wrongdoings, but we will have given to the union members of the Nation a right which belongs to them. How long would some of the crooks who have paraded before the McClellan committee stay in office in their unions if the workers had secrecy and protection in voting their ballots, and a right to vote and have the vote counted?

It would put an end to the holding of elections at times and at places inconvenient or almost impossible for workers to attend. It would put an end to the practice of having a little clique in a union control the union and appoint to office a number of the union's employees who would make contributions to a fund to perpetuate the same officers in power. Mr. President, if we wish to put a stop to union bossism, let us vest the real power in the union members.

Mr. President, I arose to make this statement for the RECORD, so that those who read the RECORD may know the content of the amendment. In a sense, the amendment is similar to the bill of rights amendment the Senate adopted yesterday. This amendment is for the protection of the working people against bossism. The bill of rights amendment which the Senate adopted yesterday—I refer to the bill of rights amendment which was proposed by the able, fearless, and distinguished investigator, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]—will not do one thing for an employer. On the contrary, the entire purpose of that amendment is to protect the rights of the workers. So I am shocked and surprised and saddened at the forces that are in opposition to that amendment. The division on the question of incorporating that amendment in the bill was not on the basis of prolabor versus antilabor. Instead, the question was whether Senators are in favor of the small minority of union bosses who have proven themselves unworthy, or whether Senators are in favor of protecting the union members, the working people.

Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senate will adopt my amendment. Powerful forces, at work in every State of the Union, do not want anything done to disturb the power of the little cliques that control many of the unions. In the presidential nominating conventions, powerful forces will be at work; and some of those forces are catering to union bosses who perpetuate themselves in power year after year and year after year.

Mr. President, if we permit the union members to vote in secret, by mail, for the nomination of the officers of their unions, and if we then permit the union members to follow a similar procedure in the case of the elections, their officers will truly reflect the membership, and we shall have put the power where it belongs—namely, in the hands of the rank-and-file members of the unions; and thus we shall have put an end to the seizure of unions by unworthy persons.

I should like to point to the record which was developed by the McClellan committee in regard to the election of the officers of the San Francisco local of the Union of Operative Engineers. My recollection is that that union had 22,000 members. The record shows that an election was conducted, and that 2,000 members of the union voted. The principal union officers then proceeded to count the ballots. For that purpose, they went to a cabin in the mountains, where they counted 500 ballots, and then got tired, and decided to play cards for a while and have some drinks, and to estimate the returns. When they got through estimating the returns, the winning slate was declared to have won by 17,000 votes—even though only 2,000 members of the union had voted.

Mr. President, why did those officers resort to such dishonesty? The record is filled with evidence of the mishandling of funds on the part of the officers of that local union. They did not want the control of the union turned over to other officers.

Incidentally, Mr. President, the members of that union are scattered among the many States, including Hawaii. How could they assemble at a union hall, to vote in an election?

Mr. President, under this amendment a ballot would be mailed to each one of the members of the union, and each member would have first a part in the nomination of the officers. The ballots on the nominations would be handled by a neutral and approved counting officer. Subsequently, in the election, a ballot containing the names of those nominated would likewise be sent to each one of the members of the union; and each of the ballots would subsequently be returned to an approved counting officer; and there would be ample provision for protection of the secrecy of the ballots.

Mr. President, at a later time I shall offer this amendment again. At this time I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw the amendment, which is identified as "4–17–59–E."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has a right to withdraw his own amendment; and it is withdrawn.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, when the Senator from Nebraska has concluded, I desire to call up an amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is identified as "4–21–59–A," and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 58 of the bill, in lines 12 and 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "by striking out the second sentence thereof", and insert in lieu thereof the following:

By amending the second sentence thereof to read as follows: "Employees on strike may vote under such regulations as the National Labor Relations Board shall find are consistent with the purposes and provisions of this act."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I desire to modify the amendment as follows: In line 5, change the word

"may" to "shall". I make this modification after consultation with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has a right to modify his own amendment; and it will be modified accordingly.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I have submitted the amendment not only to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], but also to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. I think both those Senators have indicated that they believe adoption of the amendment to be desirable.

Mr. President, one part of the so-called Ervin amendment struck out the sentence reading as follows:

> Employees on strike, not entitled to reinstatement, shall not be entitled to vote.

This amendment would, in effect, restore that sentence, so as to place the voting under such regulations as the National Labor Relations Board shall find are consistent with the purposes and provisions of the act.

It seems desirable because it would make it possible for the National Labor Relations Board to establish a time limit, if it thought it was consistent to do so, or to determine or define the status of employees on strike who would be entitled to vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I think that under the provisions of the bill we repeal the section which prohibits economic strikers from having the right to vote. As I understand the purpose of the amendment, it is to permit the National Labor Relations Board, by regulation, to prescribe a terminal date. For example, if there were a strike and the members were never rehired, and got other jobs, and month after month after month there were appeals before the National Labor Relations Board, and court judgments, at least it would be possible for the National Labor Relations Board at some date to say, "This matter is closed, and there is no longer a right to vote."

I do not think the amendment means, and I do not think the Senator from South Dakota would suggest it means, that the National Labor Relations Board will issue a flat statement that, "1 month after the beginning of a strike the employee shall be denied the right to vote." If that were so, I am sure the Senator from South Dakota would offer precise language covering such a situation.

Our purpose is to permit economic strikers to vote while there is a lawful strike in progress, a strike for a reasonable and proper purpose, and to permit the Board to adopt a rule of reason in making a judgment as to when it would be wise to terminate the right.

Have I stated the situation correctly?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from Massachusetts has stated it well.

In the discussion had the other day, when this matter first arose, the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] brought out the uncertainty which would be created if it were merely stated that employees on strike forever after have a right to vote in a particular industry. Some confusion would result if those employees had gone on to other jobs, or if years had elapsed. It was suggested that there should be more certainty provided. That certainty can be provided by the National Labor Relations Board, under the terms of the amendment proposed. The purpose is definitely within what the Senator from Massachusetts has described.

I personally think that to flatly deny the economic striker the right to vote would be to defeat his right to strike. I think the right to strike ought to be preserved, consistent with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. I offer the amendment with the intention to preserve that right, but also to put in the hands of the National Labor Relations Board the power to issue regulations consistent with the act, which would define the period of time and the status of the striker who could vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. And I hope the National Labor Relations Board, in attempting to develop such regulations, would have regard to the discussion which the Senator from South Dakota and I have had, at least as indicating our view, which I think is a common one.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call upon my amendment identified as "4–15–59–Q."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 7, lines 16 and 17, to strike out the words "aggregating in excess of $250".

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment. On page 5 of the bill, we find title I, the Reporting and Disclosure title. Let us turn to page 7, line 16, subsection (5) (b) (4). My purpose is to amend that provision by striking out the $250 amount.

This amendment requires the union to report on all loans to any officer, employee, or member, regardless of the amount of such loan. The committee bill, requiring a report on loans to officers and members only where the loan or loans totaled more than $250, would allow the union to make loans of $250 or less to favored members and officers. This exemption from the reporting requirement actually circumvents the real purpose of this section, namely, to provide the union member with an opportunity of knowing exactly what his union is doing and how the finances of his union are being handled. In contrast to the treatment of loans to officers and members, the union must report on all loans, regardless of amount, made to business enterprises. There is no reason at all why these loans should be treated differently, especially in view of the fact that loans to officers and employees are far more common than are loans to business enterprises.

If the purpose of a union financial report is to have any meaning, then this amendment must be adopted.

In the subcommittee we reduced the amount from $500 to $250. It is the feeling of the junior Senator from Arizona, and, I may say, some of the other members of the minority, that no amount should be specified, that all loans should be reported.

I should like to ask my distinguished friend from Massachusetts if he might not be willing to agree that the amount "$250" could be stricken.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Under the provisions of the bill it is provided that it shall be against the law for a union to lend any union member or officer over $1,500. It may be that figure is a little high, but at least that was the prohibition voted for by the committee.

Originally in the committee there was a provision before it that any loan of over $500 should be publicly reported. It was felt that amount was too high, and the figure was reduced to $250.

The way the bill reads it is against the law for any union to make any loan of more than $1,500 to anyone in the union. Loans of over $250 must be reported.

The Senator from Arizona seeks to eliminate the amount completely and provide that every time a union loans $10, $15, $20 to a member who may have a medical bill or may be in some difficulty, a public report must be made. If that is not putting the hand of the Federal Government deep into the affairs of a voluntary organization, I do not know what is. This proposal does not involve the rights of union members, about which we have been hearing so much for several days.

I know the Senator from Arizona offers the amendment in good faith, but I say to him that I would perhaps drop the $1,500 prohibition, because that may be too high a figure, and I would be prepared to accept $175 as a figure instead of $250; I think the Senator from Arizona is going further than is necessary to protect the equity of the union members when he provides that loans of this size must be publicly reported. It seems to me it is not necessary.

Would the Senator from Arizona consider some changes?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I may say the principal reason why I have made the suggestion is not particularly that the figure is $250, or that it should be $2 or $20, but that the reporting of all these loans is not required, regardless of what the limit is. I can imagine that in some unions the use of such a loan could be for political purposes within the union. In other words, it could be said, "If you want to borrow some money to help pay your medical expenses, you had better be on the right side, politically, of the union, or a loan will not be forthcoming."

I am not as concerned as the Senator from Massachusetts is about the amount of work which would be entailed. In corporations and other businesses work of this kind is done, the funds are kept in separate accounts, and they are available for reporting purposes to stockholders or to officers at any time. It does not entail any work. It does not necessarily mean there will be a great many loans. I am not against the lending of money, although it would have to be provided for in the constitution.

However, if we have an exemption point, I think we may find that exemption point will be used as a source of power against the union members.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I understand the proposal, if a man were to borrow $10 to pay a medical bill, under the language the Senator from Arizona has suggested, it would require a report. Is that a correct understanding?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. At the end of the year, when the report was made, there would be a place in the column prescribed by the Secretary of Labor for the listing of loans to members. The books would be reflected on the report.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let us suppose the money had been repaid in the meantime.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That would be indicated on the form.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I say to the Senator, if the Senate feels it wise I would accept some change from the $250 to perhaps a lower figure, but I really do not see why we should point the finger of suspicion to such an extent as is proposed. This really does not involve, in my opinion, the rights of union members or their protection, because under the bill if anyone seeks to defraud any union by any means, direct or indirect, he is subject to sharp criminal penalties. All the amendment would do is to require that any loan of a rather small amount be reported to the Government, which I think would be extremely burdensome and unnecessary, and I think it would reflect a view of unions and union members and their ability to govern themselves not shared by the chairman of the committee.

I am opposed to the amendment, and I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I repeat, it is not the amount of money which worries me. I would not want to have it provide $5 or $10 or any amount of money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will not yield back my time yet, Mr. President.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am concerned about the matter. We can conceive of a situation where a man needs to borrow money and the only source might be the union. The man might say, "I would like to borrow $100 to take care of my hospital expenses," and the union treasurer might say, "We have an election coming up in the union next month. For whom are you going to vote?" That might affect whether the man got the loan or not. If he is on the right side in the election he might get the loan, and if not, he might not. This could be a source of power, rather than a simple loaning of money.

I am very hopeful that the Senator from Massachusetts will take the amendment. We have come down a long ways from the original figure. We have cut the figure in half. I think we can eliminate it entirely. I do not think it would be a burden. I do not think it would reach the hand of the Federal Government into the matter any further.

After all, we are talking about sums of money paid in for the purpose of promoting collective bargaining or any other purpose. If the constitution of the union provides that the money can be loaned to the members for certain purposes, that is perfectly all right, but we should require the reporting of the loans. I am sure the loans would be kept on the books, and there would not be a duplication of effort. Any well-run union will record any loan for $1 or 50 cents, up to the legal amount.

I get back to my thesis, which is not the amount of money but the potential threat of power which rests with the ability to make loans.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

In the first place, in the example the Senator gave, if the money were loaned prior to an election and represented not an obligation which had to be repaid but an attempt to influence a vote, that type of loan is already prohibited by the language. Secondly, if there were a loan in lieu of a payment which was going to be paid off to a union officer, that also is prohibited.

It seems to be that if the union is engaging in a practice of making loans for purposes which are really some sort of a "payoff" it would be a crime under the law. I wonder whether this amendment really is necessary.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The point I make is that it would be very difficult to prove such a crime, if it were not necessary to report the loans. In other words, if the president of the union has the ability to make a $250 loan and another man comes in, as an example, he might say, "You and I had an argument in the past." And he might say, "I am sorry, but I cannot lend you the money."

Circumstances might affect the stand of one man against another or for another in the future. That is what I am afraid might happen. It is not that the money will not be repaid, but the money does not have to be reported. I assure the Senator that every well run union in the country keeps a record of all loans and the pay back. It is not a case of a "payoff," because these loans are bona fide loans. I am not objecting to the making of loans by the union. I am objecting to the fact that the loans are not reported.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I have said, we were attempting to reach a figure which was rather petty. There was not an attempt to provide for concealment or "payoffs." The Senator is unwilling to reach any figure of agreement. As I said, I was willing to take a lower figure than the $250, to make sure these were petty loans. If there is no common ground, I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Would the Senator want to get really petty and say $10?

Mr. KENNEDY. I think that is really petty, and not worthy of the Senator. Why does the Senator not suggest some figure more near to what I was discussing?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I said that as a pleasantry, of course. I do not want to retreat. If the Senator is not willing to accept the amendment, I would rest upon the judgment of the Senate.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COTTON in the chair). All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona (putting the question).

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk. There is no number on it, but it was sent down prior to the deadline.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have his amendment read in full?

Mr. PROUTY. It is very short, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order, so that the amendment may be heard. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 41, between lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to insert the following new subsection:

(e) Any person who willfully denies or attempts to deny to a member of a labor organization any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of section 301 or section 302 shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Vermont yield to himself?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield myself 10 minutes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, criminal penalties are provided in the bill as follows:

Section 108(a) for willful violation of title I relating to reporting and disclosure or the Secretary's regulations, $10,000 or not more than 1 year, or both.

Section 108(b) for false statements, and so forth, in information required, $10,000 or not more than 1 year, or both.

Section 108(c) for false entry or concealment of books and records, $10,000 or not more than 1 year, or both.

Section 109(a) for embezzlement of union funds, $10,000 or not more than 5 years, or both.

Page 30 to 31, section 201(c), for willful violation of or failure to comply with trusteeship section or regulations, $10,000, or not more than 1 year, or both.

Section 201(d), for making false statements in or concealing, destroying, and so forth, books and records required to be kept, $10,000, or not more than 1 year, or both.

Page 32, section 203(b), for counting votes of trusteed union not chosen by secret ballot or transferring its funds, except normal per capita tax and assessments, $10,000, or not more than 1 year, or both.

Page 43, section 305(c) for violation of section 506 prohibiting fine or discipline of union members or threat of or use of force or violence or economic reprisals if members exercise or to prevent them from exercising any right to which he is entitled under the act, $10,000, or not more than 2 years, or both.

The sections to which I refer relate to elections. There is no penalty whatsoever for any officer of a union who violates these election provisions. It seems to me that is one of the most important considerations with which we are confronted, and that we certainly should make a penalty applicable in such cases.

A member may not be coerced, but he may be denied his rights. His rights may be ignored by the union officers, and there is nothing he can do about it. The only alternative, after the member has exhausted his recourse before the union officers, is an appeal to the Secretary of Labor, who, if the evidence seems to justify it, can institute court action. If the court finds, upon a preponderance of the evidence after trial on the merits, that an election has not been held within the times prescribed in this section, or that the violation of section 301 may have affected the result of an election, a new election may be held. But anyone who steals ballots, or who refuses to allow a member his rights, so long as he does not coerce him, is not subject to penalty.

It seems to me that this is one section of the bill which should carry a substantial penalty.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

I ask the Senator from Vermont how this provision compares with the language we now have on page 53 in section 506(a), which deals with the problem of reprisal.

Is the amendment of the Senator from Vermont printed?

Mr. PROUTY. No. It is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is typewritten.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont a question as to what he is attempting to deal with, which might not be covered by the language dealing with reprisals.

Mr. PROUTY. Is the Senator referring to section 506?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct—section 506 (a), (b), and (c).

Mr. PROUTY. Let me raise this question with the Senator: Suppose, for example, that a union officer refuses to allow a candidate to utilize the facilities of the union for the mailing of campaign literature——

Mr. KENNEDY. I am sorry, but I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. PROUTY. Suppose a union officer refuses to allow a candidate who may be running against an incumbent officer to utilize the facilities of the union for the mailing of campaign literature, and things of that nature. I do not believe any penalty would apply if there were no coercion. The union officials may not deny certain rights, but the rights can be ignored.

Mr. KENNEDY. It is my impression that the language we now have on elections, as a result of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, provides, first, that the Secretary shall have power to set the election aside. Second, one of the grounds for setting it aside would be denial by the union to a member of the right to mail out his literature 30 days before the election.

Mr. PROUTY. Suppose an observer at the election comes to a candidate and says, "They are stealing the ballots." What penalty would be applicable? What right would the candidate have?

Mr. KENNEDY. As the Senator knows, after the election, under the provisions suggested by the Senator from Vermont, every candidate would have the right to have a teller. If a candidate were denied the right to have a teller, then, of course, the Secretary of Labor could set the election aside.

In addition, if he were denied that right by the means we suggest on page 53 the situation would be covered. That language reads as follows:

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person through the use of force or violence, or threat of the use of force or violence, or by economic reprisal or threat thereof, to restrain, coerce, or intimidate, or attempt to restrain, coerce, or intimidate any member of a labor organization for the purpose of interfering with or preventing the exercising by such member of any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this act.

It seems to me that we have the situation pretty well nailed down.

Mr. PROUTY. If there is violence or intimidation, of course that would be true; but suppose there is no violence or intimidation, but merely an ignoring of the right of the member or a failure to grant him his right.

I refer to subsection (c) of section 305, on page 43, line 18. Initially one might assume that this referred to the entire title. It does not. It merely refers to section 305. I believe that unless force or intimidation is used, no penalty can be applied against any individual member of the union or any officer of the union.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the breach should occur prior to the date of the election, of course, State remedies would be available. If the breach should occur after the date of the election, the Secretary would have the power to set the election aside.

The language in section 506 (a), (b), and (c) is extremely general in its application, and I think it would pretty well protect the right of any union member to enforce any of his rights granted under the bill. It seems to me that the situation is pretty well covered. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. PROUTY. I think there is a very grave question.

Mr. KENNEDY. Section 102, in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] provides as follows:

SEC. 102. Any officer or agent of any such labor organization who, through use or abuse of authority, or through failure to discharge the duties of his office, or otherwise, willfully interferes with or prevents, or attempts to interfere with or prevent, the exercise by any member of a right to which such member is entitled under the provisions of section 101 shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Section 103 provides as follows:

SEC. 103. The Secretary, whenever it shall appear that any person has violated or is about to violate any of the provisions of this title, may bring an action in a district court or other court of the United States for such relief as may be appropriate including, but without limitation, injunctions to restrain any such violations and to compel compliance with this title. Any such action against a labor organization may be brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia or in the district court or other court of the United States where the violation occurred or is about to occur.

I must say to the Senator that it seems to me that this question has been dealt with, in part, through the amendments of the Senator from Arkansas.

I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I believe the Senator is referring only to section 101 in title I when he makes reference to the McClellan amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. It provides for equal rights under freedom of assembly and freedom of speech, and so forth.

Mr. PROUTY. Does the Senator from Massachusetts maintain that a criminal penalty is provided which can be imposed against anyone who violates the election section of the bill without using force or coercion? If so, will he please tell me where such provision exists in the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator, as I said before, that section 506, particularly subsections (a), (b), and (c), were placed in the bill to protect members of unions in the exercise of their rights and to protect them against reprisals.

Mr. PROUTY. What action could be taken against one who violates that section?

Mr. KENNEDY. The bill provides:

Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 2 years, or both.

Mr. PROUTY. That is not the section. That refers to force and intimidation.

Mr. KENNEDY. The section provides penalties for the use of force or violence,

"or threat of the use of force or violence, or by economic reprisal or threat thereof, or intimidate, or attempt to restrain, coerce, or intimidate," and so forth. In the case the Senator has cited, it would seem to me the Secretary of Labor would set the election aside. I have no doubt about it, but if the Senator has any further doubt about it, I refer him to section 102, which gives the Secretary of Labor the powers granted to him under the McClellan amendment which we adopted yesterday.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. I should like to point out that a court could not take any action unless it could be proven that what was perpetrated affected the outcome of an election. I am of the belief that under the bill no penalty can be imposed against anyone who fraudulently conducts an election, unless force, intimidation, or reprisal is engaged in.

Mr. KENNEDY. Perhaps the Senator can tell us what officer of a corporation is subject to a criminal penalty because he may deny a stockholder the right to vote through a ruling of the Chair.

Mr. PROUTY. If the Senator will yield again, I should like to point out that labor unions are voluntary organizations, and that they represent the savings and the interests and the livelihood of millions of workers in this country. If we refuse to penalize an officer of a union for engaging in fraud or stealing ballots, we are cooperating with the corrupt elements in the labor movement. I cannot understand why the Senator should object.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time except for 1 minute, to say that the person the Senator has described is subject to a penalty, and if he denies anyone the right to vote the Secretary of Labor can set the election aside.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COTTON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "4–17–59—Z."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 51, lines 10 and 11, it is proposed to strike out all of subsection (j) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(j) Secret ballot means the expression by ballot, voting machine, or otherwise, but in no event by proxy, of a choice with respect to any election, referendum, or vote taken upon any matter, which is cast in such a manner that the person expressing such choice cannot be identified with the choice expressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Arizona yield to himself?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Chair cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment. On page 51 I would strike out all of subsection (j) and I would insert in lieu thereof the following:

Secret ballot means the expression by ballot, voting machine, or otherwise, but in no event by proxy, of a choice with respect to any election, referendum, or vote taken upon any matter, which is cast in such a manner that the person expressing such choice cannot be identified with the choice expressed.

All I am trying to do is to prevent voting by proxy.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand the amendment, the Senator is attempting to outlaw the use of proxies. I know what he means by a secret ballot. However, I am not clear as to what he means by the rest of the language. Why does he not say: "Secret ballot means any secret written referendum or voting machine ballot, but in no event by proxy"? That seems to cover the subject. I do not know what the rest of the language means.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I took the language from the McClellan bill because I thought it very clearly defined a secret ballot. It states: "which is cast in such a manner that the person expressing such choice cannot be identified with the choice expressed." I agree that considerable verbiage is used to express secrecy.

Mr. KENNEDY. I understand what is meant by an election. I do not know about a referendum. The only question I have is with respect to the rest of the language. Is it possible for our staffs to study it and see if we can agree on some language which would outlaw the use of proxies where a secret election is held?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is what we are after.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, with the understanding that the time taken for the calling of the quorum will not be taken out of the time allotted to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I modify my amendment to read as follows:

Secret ballot means the expression by ballot, voting machine, or otherwise, but in no event by proxy, of a choice with respect to any election, which is cast in such a manner that the person expressing such choice cannot be identified with the choice expressed.

Mr. KENNEDY. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified.

Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I repeat what I have said, that if we go on in the cheerful way in which we are now proceeding, we will make the bill more strong, more strong, more strong, minute by minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

If no further amendment is to be offered, the next question will be on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "4–22–59–A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 54, beginning with line 19, it is proposed to strike out through line 20 on page 56 and insert the following:

(b) If the Board shall, by rule or otherwise, decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute where, in the opinion of the Board, the effect of such labor dispute on commerce is not sufficiently substantial to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction, any legally constituted agency or the courts of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands) shall have jurisdiction over such labor disputes over which the Board has declined jurisdiction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. How much time does the Senator yield himself?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield myself 5 minutes.

The purpose of the amendment is to cure what I think can result only in utter chaos in the so-called no man's land. There are many approaches to the solution of this problem. This whole subject was discussed upon the floor of the Senate at some great length during the discussion of the bill last year.

My amendment strikes out all after paragraph (a) of section 601, and simply provides in plain, easy English that where the Board has refused to accept jurisdiction of any labor dispute upon the ground that the dispute does not affect interstate commerce sufficiently to warrant the exercise of the Board's jurisdiction, then any duly constituted agency or court of any State can assume jurisdiction of the subject matter of the dispute.

The bill as now written provides:

The National Labor Relations Board shall assert, either directly or as hereinafter provided by this subsection, jurisdiction over all cases to which this act applies.

The law now provides that the Board shall accept jurisdiction, but the Board has refused to accept jurisdiction in numerous cases. It has done so upon the theory that unless the particular controversy materially affected interstate commerce, they could refuse to accept jurisdiction; this in face of the fact that the Board is required by law to accept jurisdiction of these controversies.

This action by the Board has left what has become commonly known as no man's land. The Utah case is the prime example of such action. In that case the National Labor Relations Board refused to accept jurisdiction of a case upon the ground that the case did not sufficiently affect interstate commerce to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction. The local people then appealed to the courts of the State.

I understand about 12 States have given to various agencies within those States the power to deal with this particular question.

I do not know whether any other amendments on this particular point have been filed. But it seems to me that the legislation proposed by the committee will unduly tangle up a state of affairs that is already bad. The bill provides that the Board can then enter into an agreement with any agency which is authorized by the law of such State to enter into and carry out such an agreement. The agency then is designated by the Board. The language contains certain provisos. Then, on page 55 of the bill, line 17, we read:

> The processes and orders issued by any such State agency in the exercise of such jurisdiction shall be enforced by the Board.

The bill is, in effect, as I see it, trying to make the State agencies, and perhaps even the States, the agencies of the National Labor Relations Board. This, in my opinion, is a very, very dangerous step. Even to accomplish the results which one would hope or want to accomplish by means of this proposal is a very dangerous step for Congress to take. In other words, the agencies which are now endowed by the States would be treated in such a way that they would be, in effect, no longer the agents of the States, but the agencies of the Federal Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 more minutes.

The bill then provides that "the party requesting the issuance of such complaint or filing such petition may, within such time and in such manner as the Board may by regulation prescribe, appeal the action of such State agency to the Board, and the State agency shall dispose of the matter in accordance with the decision of the Board upon such appeal."

So after the NLRB has taken the position that a matter is entirely too small for recognition by the Board, the Board then prescribes a huge set of regulations to take care of the situation. Not only that, it provides for an appeal back to the Board, so the matter ends where it would have been anyway.

The bill then provides:

> No State agency shall petition any district court of the United States for temporary relief or for a restraining order in any case without first having obtained the consent of the Board. In giving such consent the Board shall be guided by the same criteria as are applied in similar cases adjudicated by the Board itself.

After the Board has said that the cases are too small for the Board to handle, they are, in effect, turned back to the Board anyway.

My amendment simply provides that where the Board refuses or declines, by rule or otherwise, to assert jurisdiction, then the appropriate State agency which has been legally constituted to handle such matters, or the appropriate State courts, can take jurisdiction of the matters which have already been declined by the Board.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Did I correctly understand the Senator from Colorado to say that he did not know whether other amendments were proposed or contemplated along this line?

Mr. ALLOTT. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that I have at the desk an amendment which would accomplish the same purpose. I am certain we are trying to do substantially the same thing. The amendment I had intended to offer is designated "4–17–59–B." The select committee has given study to this matter. If the Senator from Colorado wishes to study my amendment, I shall be glad to discuss it with him.

I think I agree with the Senator from Colorado that it would be better to have nothing than to have what is in the bill now. My proposal would require the Board to act to promulgate a rule, which, presumably, people could understand, as to what the Board will take jurisdiction of and what it will not.

Then the amendment provides that if there is any uncertainty, one having a grievance can petition the Board for a ruling on that particular matter to ascertain whether or not the Board proposes to take jurisdiction of it under the rule. If not, it would have to act within 30 days. If not, the State courts or other agencies would have jurisdiction.

I think this situation must be remedied. It is almost a national disgrace that people in this country who suffer injury or wrong have no remedy anywhere, when the Board says, "This matter is too trifling for us to bother with," and yet jurisdiction is taken away from the courts or from any other agency.

So I intended to propose such an amendment; and I am very glad to know that the Senator from Colorado also seeks to have this situation corrected. I invite him to examine my amendment.

Mr. ALLOTT. I shall be very happy to do so, Mr. President.

I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may suggest the absence of a quorum, without having the time required for the quorum call charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, one of the most important problems which faced the committee was that raised by the existence of the no man's land in labor relations, resulting from a series of decisions by the Supreme Court. The problem is not a new one. A considerable portion of the 1953 hearings was devoted to the problem of preemption of State law by the Federal statute. During the Senate debate in 1954, my amendment which sought to confer upon the States authority to regulate strikes and picketing was made the first order of business. The bill was recommitted, without taking a vote on my amendment.

In 1954, we were confronted with Supreme Court decisions, in the Garner and other cases, holding that the Federal law had preempted the field, thus striking down State laws on recognition picketing, mass picketing, secondary boycotts, stranger picketing, picketing in the absence of a labor dispute, strike votes, and so forth. At that time the Supreme Court had told us, in its Garner decision:

> Congress, in enacting such legislation as we have here, can save alternative or supplemental State remedies by express terms, or by some clear implication if it sees fit.

Congress did nothing about the problem in 1954. Now the problem becomes more acute as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Guss case. In order to understand the problem, it must be understood that the NLRB has for many years operated under jurisdictional standards which it has published in a series of decisions. Those standards are arrived at by establishing a dollar-volume-of-business test which differs from industry to industry. If a business falls below that dollar volume, the NLRB does not take jurisdiction. For example, a manufacturer must do an annual business of $50,000, and a retailer must have sales of one-half million annually, if the Board is to take jurisdiction. In 1954, we assumed that if a business fell below the Board's standard, the State might handle the dispute. However, in the Guss case the Supreme Court held that if interstate commerce was affected, the States might not act, even though the NLRB had declined jurisdiction. The Court recognized that the effect of its decision might be to "create a vast no man's land, subject to regulation by no agency or court." The Court stated that "Congress is free to change the situation at will," and then noted that in 1954 the Senate Labor Committee had proposed an amendment which would have empowered State courts and agencies to act when the NLRB declined jurisdiction. The committee's bill, S. 2650, was recommitted. In that connection, I refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 100, part 5, page 6203.

In 1957, the American Bar Association took cognizance of the problem presented by the Guss line of decisions, and its House of Delegates adopted a resolution supporting the enactment of legislation or the taking of appropriate administration action which would provide a remedy for the administrative inaction of the NLRB. The organized bar felt strongly that it is contrary to established principles of Anglo-American jurisprudence that persons should suffer injury under existing provisions of law and yet be without a remedy.

The committee bill requires the NLRB to assert jurisdiction over all cases, but permits that agency to make with State agencies agreements whereby such State agencies are designated as the agents of the NLRB to handle cases in which the impact upon commerce is not significant. However, the State agencies must apply and enforce the provisions of the Federal law, as interpreted by the NLRB and the Federal courts. For all practical purposes, this provision does nothing but require the NLRB to assert jurisdiction in every case where commerce is affected. The scheme so completely negates the sovereign character of the several States that it is impossible to believe that any of them would voluntarily submit one of its agencies to the subordinate status to which the proposal would reduce them. The proposal would also require every State to enact new legislation, and would also require most of them to create new agencies. Since almost all business affects interstate commerce, the committee bill would require the NLRB to take jurisdiction over almost every case.

Boyd Leedom, Chairman of the NLRB, when asked whether his agency could take jurisdiction over the estimated 23 percent of the U.S. employers now in the jurisdictional void, testified:

> I said before, and I think it is so now, that that is too gigantic a burden to throw on the Labor Board. I think it would reflect badly on the important cases to have us undertake to try all the little cases (transcript, p. 882).

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the sponsor of Senate bill 505, said:

> I frankly do not think any of the proposals will solve no-man's land, including the one we put forward, and the administration bill (transcript, p. 884).

The Senator from Massachusetts again indicated his reservations with respect to this provision of his bill, S. 505, when he said:

> Mr. Bernstein's questions very clearly brought out, as others have, the unsatisfactory feature of the solution which was reluctantly proposed by Senator IVES and myself (transcript, p. 935).

Under its present jurisdictional standards, the Labor Board processes over 13,000 cases a year. To require it to proceed in all cases affecting commerce creates administrative chaos. The words "affecting commerce" have been construed to embrace almost any enterprise, so long as it regularly imports goods from outside the State or exports goods to points outside the State, no matter how small the value of the goods. It can readily be seen that if the provisions of Senate bill 1555 were enacted the Federal Board would be required to take jurisdiction in a vast number of disputes where the effect on commerce is minor. The expenditure by the Federal Board of time and money in those cases would plainly detract from its ability to proceed in cases having a truly substantial effect upon interstate commerce, and where its services from the national viewpoint are most vitally needed.

The provisions of either my amendment or Senator MCCLELLAN'S bill, S. 1386, provide the most satisfactory remedy to the problem. For many years the Board has been promulgating jurisdictional standards, without serious objection to its so doing, or without serious objection to the standards which it has fixed. The very fact that it has found it necessary to change such standards from time to time demonstrates the lack of wisdom in proposing that Congress, whose processes are much slower, fix such standards. Again, it is argued that to permit the States to occupy the jurisdictional void would result in a hodgepodge of differing State laws, creating confusion and conflict with the national labor policy. But until the decision of the Supreme Court in the Guss case, the States were occupying this field, and we were not given any examples of the dire consequences predicted by this argument.

The bill of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and my amendment accomplish the same purpose. The NLRB is given the discretion to decline jurisdiction over any case or classes of cases which it believes do not have a substantial effect on commerce. Thus, the NLRB's right to use jurisdictional standards is given statutory approval. The Board could decline to take jurisdiction over an entire industry, as it has in the past with respect to the hotel industry and the restaurant industry, if the Board found the effect on commerce was not sufficiently substantial to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction.

Once the NLRB has announced its jurisdictional standards, the various States have complete freedom to take cases where the volume of the employer's business does not meet the standards. The litigant is not required to take the useless step of first having its case declined by the National Board before seeking relief at the State level.

Of necessity, the State agencies will, for the most part, handle only small business. Small business needs quick relief, and no one contends that it cannot be more quickly obtained at the State level.

I am very hopeful that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado and the amendment suggested by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], can be brought into oneness, so that we can proceed to act in this most important field, in which, I may say, if it has not been touched on, action was recommended in the interim report of the McClellan committee last year, and in which field we have heard testimony to the effect that the business people in this country and small unions suffer.

What we need in the labor-management field in the way of law touching this area is not slower processes, but quicker processes. We need as fast action as we can get. It is the opinion of the Senator from Arizona that the States can act much faster than can the Federal Government.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Colorado for yielding to me.

Mr. ALLOTT. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. President, may I inquire how much time remains to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JORDAN in the chair). The Senator from Colorado has 14 minutes remaining to him.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to inquire whether there are any other Senators who wish to speak to the amendment, or if any of the time on the other side is intended to be used in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield some time to me?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am very happy to yield to the Senator from Arkansas such time as he wishes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, as I stated a few moments ago, I shall offer, as a substitute for the pending amendment, my amendment, which is at the desk. I may say to the clerk that I am not now offering it. I said I shall offer it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to ask, for the information of the Senator from Arkansas and myself, whether an amendment offered as a substitute to an amendment to strike out language in the bill is now possible, or whether it would be an amendment in the third degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to strike out language is in order.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand, it would be in order for a Senator to offer an amendment to that section dealing with no man's land, would it not?

Mr. GOLDWATER. An amendment can be offered, and an amendment has been offered to that section of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator from Arkansas offered a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, would not such an amendment be in the third degree?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such an amendment would be in the second degree only.

Mr. KENNEDY. Can the substitute for the substitute be perfected, or can that be done only with the consent of the Senator from Arkansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such an amendment can be perfected by consent.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is not in the nature of a substitute for a substitute, but in the nature of an amendment to an amendment. I make that statement as a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Is this a substitute for an amendment, or an amendment to an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arkansas give us the number of the amendment he proposes to offer?

Mr. McCLELLAN. 4–17–59–B.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time used in this colloquy not be taken from the time on either side on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, we are killing a little time here, apparently, but it would be well to have this question settled for future purposes, since the Senator agrees that possibly my amendment could be considered as a substitute. The amendment probably could be withdrawn, and the purpose could be accomplished in that way. However, it might be well to have this parliamentary question disposed of, so we may know how to proceed later.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I asked the parliamentary question because the Senator from Massachusetts had indicated the amendment might be a substitute for a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would be a substitute for language in the substitute proposed by the Senator from Colorado, and would be an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I have yielded time to the Senator from Arkansas——

Mr. McCLELLAN. There is a unanimous-consent agreement in effect at the moment that the time taken in this colloquy would not be taken from either side.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I think the situation may not be understood. Perhaps the Chair did not hear. I have offered an amendment in due course. The senior Senator from Arkansas has not offered anything. There is only one amendment pending before the Senate. Therefore, I conceive the situation to be that there is an amendment pending, and that if the Senator from Arkansas desired to offer his amendment, he could do so. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has stated the situation correctly.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I believe I had the floor on time yielded on the pending amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall resume my privilege under that time allotment.

Mr. President, as I pointed out a few moments ago, it will be my purpose, since the parliamentary situation has been clarified, to offer the amendment which I have identified as "4–17–59–B" as a substitute for the pending amendment.

I shall do this, Mr. President, because we have given considerable thought to this problem and we have worked out an amendment which it seems to me could be accepted by everyone as a solution to the problem.

I will state briefly what the amendment would do. We all know that the no man's land problem, as I said a few moments ago, is almost a national disgrace in America from the standpoint that people are being wronged, are suffering impositions and injuries, and have no remedy in the Federal courts, in the State courts, or before the National Labor Relations Board, when the Board wants to deny them a remedy, and it is often denying a remedy.

We have a situation in which people are suffering and there is no recourse to any tribunal, to any law, or any source from which they can get relief.

Mr. President, I do not propose, by offering the amendment, to detract one iota, or to any degree whatsoever, from the authority which the Board now has, but I simply would require the Board to, by rule or regulation, clarify and define those cases which it feels are not of sufficient importance and do not sufficiently burden or interfere with interstate commerce to warrant its time and its attention.

Under the proposed amendment the Board would have to issue a general rule to say, "This class of cases we will not handle." Then, in order that those cases not be without a remedy and without a tribunal or source where persons can go for correction or redress from the wrong, I propose they would go to the local courts, where the local courts would have jurisdiction to adjudicate.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take anything away from the Board, but the amendment would provide that in case of any doubt on the part of the litigant, on the part of the aggrieved person who is seeking a remedy, there would be authority to take the matter to the Board. If the man goes to his attorney and says, "I want relief from this situation," and if the attorney looks at the facts and thereafter says, "I cannot tell from this state of facts and from the rule which has been promulgated by the Board exactly whether the Board has jurisdiction or whether the State courts have jurisdiction under that rule or under that regulation," then it is provided, Mr. President, that the matter simply be submitted to the Board, exactly as one would file a complaint. The man would say, "Here are the facts we need to have adjudicated."

The Board within thirty days could either take jurisdiction or decline jurisdiction. If the Board declined jurisdiction, the suit could be brought or the remedy could be sought in the State court or in whatever tribunal might have jurisdiction. If the Board thought it ought to take jurisdiction and that the matter did not come within the rule excluding jurisdiction, then the Board could take jurisdiction and the issue could be settled. The man would get his relief from the Board and his adjudication from the Board.

To show that there is not an attempt to hamper the Board, we even go further and provide that, at any time, the Board may modify or change that rule which it has promulgated. If the board finds the rule is not working satisfactorily, or that it has gone too far one way or too far another way, as the case may be, the Board can revise and modify the rule.

Therefore, we provide for the setting up of a process for the permanent elimination of the no man's land, and for the setting up of a directive to compel somebody to take jurisdiction. We would make it absolutely certain that no one would suffer a wrong without having a remedy and without being able to find the source to which he can go to get relief from the wrong which is being done.

I do not know how we could handle the matter in a better way. I do not know of a fairer way to handle it. We are not trying to be partial to the States as against the Federal Government. We are not trying to detract in any sense from the prestige of the Board. We are not trying to take away any jurisdiction the Board is willing to assert.

Why should the amendment not be agreed to? It is very simple. It is very plain. I say to Senators, this is a clear-cut matter. Even a layman can understand the proposal. The language which is in the bill now is so complicated that I do not think anyone, even a lawyer, can understand it.

Mr. ALLOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. ERVIN rose.

Mr. ALLOTT. Does the Senator desire to have me yield time?

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the Senator will yield me 1 minute, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ALLOTT. I am happy to yield to the Senator 1 minute.

Mr. ERVIN. I want to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he does not think it is a disgrace to any system of justice to have people suffering wrongs and not provide them some remedy?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have said that. I have said it is almost a national disgrace, in our system of jurisprudence and our philosophy of government, to find that there are people who are suffering wrongs and who have no remedy. We have brought about this situation by the legislation enacted here.

Mr. ERVIN. The amendment of the Senator would provide a remedy for all controversies arising under the Taft-Hartley Act, would it not?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It would provide for a remedy somewhere—for a tribunal to adjudicate the matters. The National Labor Relations Board would have the first right. That would be a continuing right. The Board could make it exclusive, or it could yield or cede to the State courts the jurisdiction it did not want to take.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. ALLOTT. I do not know whether the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor desires to use the time in opposition to the amendment or not. I do not care to yield back the remainder of my time unless the time is to be yielded back by the other side.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am happy to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I should like to inquire of the distinguished Senator about his amendment, for information. I feel that we should definitely do something about the no man's land problem.

In the second page of the amendment it is provided that if the National Labor Relations Board declines to assert jurisdiction, any legally constituted agency or the courts of any State shall have jurisdiction.

In the State of New York we have a State labor board. I assume that the State labor board would automatically have jurisdiction over such labor disputes as the National Labor Relations Board declined to take jurisdiction over.

Mr. ALLOTT. I believe the Senator's State is one of those which have such legislation and such a board.

Mr. KEATING. Are there States which do not have labor boards and in which the courts have jurisdiction directly, by statute, over all labor disputes?

Mr. ALLOTT. I will answer the Senator's question in this way: I am informed that there are only 12 States which have such enabling statutes as the Senator's State has. In my opinion, the ability to take over such disputes would be inherent in the State courts if it were not for the question of preemption, which we encounter in connection with labor disputes.

Mr. KEATING. I can see that.

Does the Senator believe that in a State such as New York, which has a legally constituted agency, the State labor board, it would be clear, under the wording of his amendment, that that State board, rather than the courts of the State of New York, would have jurisdiction? I think that should be so, because it has been decided in the State of New York that all labor disputes should be within the jurisdiction of the State board. Would it be necessary, in the Senator's opinion, to have language inserted after the words "legally constituted agency"? I suggest the insertion of the words "or if there be none, then the courts," or some similar language.

Mr. ALLOTT. I shall be glad to modify my amendment in that respect. I can see nothing in the Senator's language which would hurt the amendment at all. Will he repeat it?

Mr. KEATING. I suggest that after the words "agency or" there be inserted the words "if there be no legally constituted agency."

Mr. ALLOTT. I am glad to modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. President, I am very much gratified at the great interest in this problem. It is a shame that the Congress has so long left this area untouched, and left so many people, both employers and employees, without recourse to any legal board, or any court to obtain redress and a determination of their disputes.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. I should like to ask a question. I should like to direct my question also to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

Under present jurisdictional standards of the National Labor Relations Board, the Board will move in in the case of a nonretail establishment if the gross volume of business is $50,000. It will not come in if the gross volume of business is $49,000. Let us assume that there are two plants in the identical business, in the same State. One comes under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, and the other under the jurisdiction of the State courts. Most States have no laws relative to this subject. Just what happens? Is there any uniformity? Will all people be treated alike? If there are unfair labor practices in the $50,000 plant, they will be taken care of. If they exist in the smaller plant, they will not be.

Mr. ALLOTT. First of all, in the 12 States which have boards established, the disputes would be handled by the boards. In the other instances, it seems to me perfectly clear that the State courts would handle them, in accordance with State law.

Mr. PROUTY. If I am correctly informed, not more than 10 or 12 States have boards, or any laws relative to this subject at the present time.

Mr. ALLOTT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PROUTY. I have an amendment prepared which I think would have provided a higher degree of uniformity, but in view of the time situation, it is impossible for me to offer it and explain it thoroughly. I think this is one of the most important considerations in the entire bill, and I regret very much that time is so limited, because I do not think we are solving the problem by this method. We are creating inequities in many cases.

Mr. ALLOTT. I offered this amendment with all the earnestness at my command, because I believe that the amendment would leave the situation much improved as compared with the present act. I suggest to the Senator that the Senator from Arkansas has already indicated that he intends to offer a substitute at the proper time, which he cannot do until the time has expired. He intends to offer a substitute for my amendment when the time expires. The Senator will have equal opportunity, of course.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. PROUTY. The basis for my proposal is that in cases in which the National Labor Relations Board refuses jurisdiction, the State courts deal with unfair labor practices, but there is no uniformity of treatment. We should maintain a degree of uniformity, so that all people involved would be treated alike. It seems to me that under the method proposed, that would be impossible. The provisions in the bill are meaningless. The objective is good, but from a practical standpoint the provisions will not work. The Senator's approach is more realistic. I am sorry that we cannot take more time and enact something which would meet the objective.

Mr. ALLOTT. I am sure we shall, before we are through.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Last year I served with the Senator on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and we considered the same problem at that time. We know that the problem exists, and that in many cases neither employers nor employees have access to anyone for the determination of their disputes. Of course that is bad. But I would like to have the Senator refresh his memory on the question which has just been raised by the Senator from Vermont.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act all jurisdiction, at least theoretically, is in the National Labor Relations Board, in disputes arising out of interstate commerce. Does the Senator not think there is an inconsistency in placing a large body of cases under the jurisdiction of State courts, where there can be no uniformity of standards, and where there can be no ready opportunity to have the disputes determined and reviewed by Federal courts? Is there not the possibility that the situation could grow into an even more complex and disordered system?

Mr. ALLOTT. The Senator has asked a very complex question.

Mr. COOPER. It is a long question, but the substance of it is simple.

Mr. ALLOTT. I shall endeavor to reply to all parts of it, so far as I can recall them.

In the first place, I do not believe my amendment could possibly work any hardship which is as bad as the present situation. The present situation simply amounts to this:

A dispute arises. It is submitted to the National Labor Relations Board. The National Labor Relations Board refuses to take jurisdiction, and the parties are thereby left out on a limb, and can resort to no board, no court, no tribunal. There they sit. Nothing could be as bad as that situation.

To answer the Senator's second question, as to whether or not the fact that there might be some difference in the application of the laws of the States might lead to some abuses. I answered by saying, perhaps. Anything that is ever submitted to any court can conceivably result in something short of perfect justice to anyone. Moreover, we are speaking of a class of cases that is, by definition, local in nature—that is, the cases do not substantially affect interstate commerce.

However, I would say to the Senator that even though there may be some variation so far as the courts are concerned, the fact that a person could go to a court and get his dispute heard and determined is something so far in advance of what we have now that there can be no question at all about it. While there seems to be the belief on the part of some people that the State courts cannot handle it, I have no doubt that if these matters are thrown into State courts, instead of remaining suspended out in space, like the Explorer or the sputnik, or something else, we will be in a far better situation than we are now, because I have great respect for the integrity of the State courts. While there may be some difference in the administration of the courts, I still believe that we will be far better off than we are at the present time.

Mr. COOPER. I certainly have respect for the State courts. In fact, I was at one time a judge of a State court. First, as everyone who is familiar with State courts knows, the dockets are crowded all the time. Secondly, these disputes are not the kind of disputes which State courts usually handle; they are of a complicated nature. For example, there is the involved question of picketing. That is extremely difficult even for the NLRB to handle.

We are not arguing against finding some method of assuring that these cases will be brought into a forum for determination. If we must find a forum, it ought to be an agency which can have continuity of experience, and one in which experienced men can deal with these complicated subjects. In that way we would have a better answer to the problem than we have now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to say only one more thing. I believe the State courts can do the job and will do it. Has my time expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. That being the situation, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment "4–17–59–D."

I call up the amendment on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], and the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT]. I am happy to have them join with me in presenting the amendment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I am sure that the Senator from Colorado is within his right in withdrawing the amendment. However, I should like to be permitted—in the form of a parliamentary inquiry—to raise a question as to whether he is within his rights, so that I may take this half minute to comment on the subject.

Mr. ALLOTT. Is the Senator directing a question to me?

Mr. MORSE. No; to the Chair. I am very much concerned about the parliamentary situation in which we find ourselves. I was not on the floor when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into. I believe we are demonstrating once again the unwisdom of entering into a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate in a legislative situation involving such a complicated subject as this. This is one of the most vital areas in the whole bill. I am the author of the section of the bill which is under discussion. It was written out on top of the table in the committee room when we had the entire no man's land situation under consideration.

I should like to have had some time to discuss the Allott amendment. Frankly, I wanted to use the time to discuss the whole problem of the no man's land, because it is such an important subject. Certainly we should try to work out a workable solution of the whole matter on the floor, because the proposal we have in the bill needs drastic modification, even though its basic principles are sound. Those principles are in contrast to both the McClellan amendment, which is now before us, and the Allott amendment, which has been taken away from us.

We cannot have this opportunity to discuss the subject. Therefore, I wonder whether it would be possible—and I am frank to say what my purpose is, namely, to discuss the matter—to lay before the Senate what I believe are constructive suggestions as to what we ought to do about the matter. Otherwise, if we follow this course of action, I believe we will end up by making a great mistake on a very complicated issue.

This is a problem which calls for the best exercise of our abilities. The decision will have a very great public effect. I am only raising the question as to whether the Senator from Colorado could delay withdrawing his amendment, so that I may have a little time in which to discuss the amendment from the other side. It has not been discussed from the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been withdrawn. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is now pending.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, in the interest of having a discussion of both sides of the question—and I may say that my point of view is quite close to that of the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Arkansas—and so that there may be equal time for discussion of both sides, I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senator from Colorado, in recalling his amendment, if he desires to do so, be rescinded, for the sole purpose of allowing the Senator from Oregon, and anyone else who may wish to participate in the debate, to use the remaining 30 minutes.

Mr. ALLOTT. Reserving the right to object, I should like to say that I hope the Senator from Oregon is not inferring that I offered my amendment simply so that I could use a half hour in talking about it.

As a matter of fact, I should like to say to the Senator from Oregon, because he had to be absent from the floor part of the time, that the RECORD will disclose that two or three times during the course of the colloquy and debate on this matter I inquired if there were any Senators on the other side of the question who desired to speak.

With reference to the request of the Senator from Florida, I should say that I inquired whether there was any Senator on the floor who wished time, and no one responded. If I yielded to the Senator's request, I would find myself with no time, because I have exhausted my time on the amendment. However, I am inclined not to object, because I do not believe anyone should be foreclosed from talking about such an important subject as this is. I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Florida, knowing that I can later withdraw my amendment, and that the Senator from Arkansas will have an amendment, which I frankly feel, after having examined it, has some beneficial aspects in it that mine did not have, and that, further, there will be ample opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. MORSE. I wish the Senator to know that nothing I have said was intended to indicate in the slightest that I thought he was engaging in any form of parliamentary tactic. It does happen that when the Senator from Colorado asked if any Senator wished to speak on the other side of the question, I was on my feet. I tried to get him to yield. The Senator then yielded to a Senator on the other side of the Chamber and he did not see me. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], was not on the floor, and the Senator from Michigan was trying to get me some time, when another colloquy developed. I have been trying to get the floor. This matter happens to be my "baby," and it has been ripped up a little bit in my absence in the Foreign Relations Committee, and therefore, I should like to have the opportunity of at least putting a little adhesive tape on it.

Mr. ALLOTT. May I inquire of the Senator whether his purpose would be served if, when the Senator from Arkansas offered his amendment, he were given equal time with the other side to discuss the amendment?

Mr. MORSE. I am simply trying to point out that I do not think enough time will be allowed under the rule if we simply limit ourselves to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. This matter is so complicated that we should, if we can, get ourselves into a parliamentary position so that we can use whatever time is available under the unanimous-consent agreement before the amendment is withdrawn.

The Senator from Colorado was very fair. He asked if any Senator wanted to speak about the matter. But the difficulty was that we did not get our lines of communication through to him. I am trying to get across the idea that I wanted to speak. I asked how much time was left.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I am certain there is no intention to cut off the time of any Senator. The truth is that we were trying to prolong the time so as to afford more opportunity for discussion. I urged that proposal upon the Senator from Colorado so that we might have a longer time in which to debate the proposal.

I announced in the beginning that I intended to offer my amendment as a substitute. Then I learned that under the unanimous-consent agreement only 1 hour is allowed for "any amendments thereto." I did not know that the phrase "amendments thereto" had been added to the unanimous-consent agreement; otherwise I would not have agreed to it.

I am not charging any Senator with bad faith. But when I agreed to the unanimous-consent proposal I thought it meant that one hour would be provided on any amendment offered to an amendment. Otherwise I would not have agreed to the limited time of 1 hour for any amendment and amendments thereto.

So we find ourselves in this situation of limited time. I was trying to get more time, because I thought the matter was important and should be discussed at length.

In view of the situation which exists, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Florida to modify the unanimous-consent request by asking for time for both sides. Let us proceed from this point on the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Colorado; then I shall offer my own amendment if and when he withdraws his.

Mr. HOLLAND. There is no thought in my mind at all of doing other than what is fair to both sides. If the distinguished Senator from Colorado will recall his action, it will mean that any time he had left will be reinstated, and that any time the distinguished Senator from Oregon or any other Senator might utilize out of the time covered by the unanimous-consent agreement can be utilized in debate.

The sole subject of my request was to have the Senate proceed in such a way as to afford the full time which is provided for both of the amendments.

I understood the Senator from Arkansas to say that he has learned that he cannot offer his amendment as a substitute without that action coming within the limitation of a single amendment, which is obviously an inadequate amount of time in which to discuss this very involved matter.

My sole thought was to permit the Senator from Colorado, who had proceeded on the assumption that no other Senator wished to speak in opposition, to recall his yielding of time, his yielding of the floor, and his withdrawal of the amendment, so that the Senate could proceed just as if that action had not been taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado had expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. I reserved objection to the request of the Senator from Florida. I withdraw the objection, because the Senator from Massachusetts has agreed with me that I may reinstate my amendment. The Senator from Massachusetts has then agreed that he will yield half of the time remaining to the proponents of the amendment and half to those who wish to oppose it, which will leave us in an equal position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida had objected to the reinstatement of the Allott amendment; but prior to that the Senator from Arkansas had offered an amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. If it be necessary to amplify my request, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arkansas be allowed to withdraw the offer of his amendment, and that the other action I have already stated be taken. I had no thought of shutting off debate on the matter. I think we will be hastening our action in the matter if we proceed as I have suggested.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Reserving the right to object, I am happy to follow the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Florida, with the understanding that it will not prejudice my right to reoffer my amendment at a later time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, under the agreement just suggested, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, at this stage of the debate, all I wish to do is to talk about some of the complicated problems which confront us concerning this matter.

I say to the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from North Carolina that I completely agree with the observation they made a few minutes ago, and which was pressed time and time again in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. We must pass some legislation on the so-called no-man's-land area, because the failure to have any legislation concerning that subject is working gross injustice to many employers and many workers throughout the country. There is a variety of solutions to the problem which can be adopted. I wish to pursue three or four of them, as I see the problem.

I have tried to live with this problem. I am the author of the section of the bill which is now under discussion; but, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and other members of our committee know, we penciled it out on the top of the table in discussions in the committee. That shows how it was done and how rapidly it was done, to carry out the principles which I think are essential, and which I shall now discuss.

The important thing to remember is that all labor and all employers are entitled, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to uniformity of application of the rules in cases which fall within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. It is the uniformity which I wish to stress.

I think it is grossly unfair to say to one group of employers and one group of workers in America, who come under the commerce clause, "You are going to have the Taft-Hartley policy applied to you"; but to say to another group, "The National Labor Relations Board, because of a present lack of personnel and because of a refusal"—I say this respectfully—"to modernize the operations of the NLRB, says it cannot take jurisdiction of your cases."

They are the no man's land cases, because the Supreme Court of the United States has held in effect that, after all, they fall within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and the parties thereto are entitled to have the Federal Government, through the National Labor Relations Board, take jurisdiction. But we know the Board is not taking jurisdiction for various reasons. So those cases are out in the cold. That is not my conception of American justice.

I think the most ideal proposal, as stated in the committee, would be to have the National Labor Relations Board departmentalized. But the Board has shown no inclination to do it on an administrative basis, although it could. Apparently, to date, there is no inclination on the part of Congress to require that by legislation.

The example I shall use is not a 100-percent parallel. It is an argument by analogy. It has some weak spots in it, as I shall be the first to admit. Those weak spots I shall try to point out.

On a much smaller scale, the problem existed during the war, when I served on the War Labor Board. The National War Labor Board was just as much bogged down as is the National Labor Relations Board. It had more cases than it could handle. We departmentalized the War Labor Board. We set up regional boards, and gave to the regional boards jurisdiction to determine with finality the cases, save and except for one ground of appeal, when the appeal was made on the ground that the regional board was not following Federal policy as laid down by the National Board in those major disputes over which the National Board retained jurisdiction. That is, the National Board reserved the right to retain national jurisdiction over certain major cases, such, for example, as shipyard cases, cases in the steel industry, in the so-called major industries of the country. That was the limitation of the appeal.

I said in committee, and I say in the Senate today, that the best solution of the no man's land problem, in my judgment, is to departmentalize the National Labor Relations Board to regional boards or district boards, which would have the power of finality. The regional boards would act under clear instructions that they were to follow the Federal standards. By Federal standards we mean rules and principles which have been developed under the Taft-Hartley law. There would be the right to appeal only in a very limited case in respect to whether the regional or district board was following the Federal standards. But I am a realist. I do not think there is any chance of the passage of that knd of legislation.

We have the so-called special committee which has been established to try to work out amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. I know of no particular field which should be of more vital concern to the special committee, headed by the distinguished professor from Massachusetts, than this matter of the no man's land.

Mr. President, we should not attempt to deal with this matter at this time, on the floor of the Senate, when we do not have adequate time, under the unanimous-consent agreement—to which I never would have agreed if I had thought it would subject us to this kind of a time straitjacket in connection with a matter as important as this one. But of course, I could not be in the Foreign Relations Committee and at the same time be in this Chamber; that is the explanation of what happened. I believe it is a mistake for us, while acting as a Committee of the Whole, to try to settle this matter here on the floor of the Senate, when even the so-called blue ribbon committee is, as I understand, having a great deal of difficulty in trying to reach a solution of this no man's land problem.

I am frank to say that I would prefer to see my proposal stricken from the bill and to see no provision at all on this subject matter included in the bill, and to have an understanding that before Congress adjourns in July or August, we will get before the Senate some proposed legislation in regard to this no man's land problem, because I do not believe we have any right to let the employers and the workers who are affected by these cases go another year without having on the statute books some legislation which will provide them with some relief or some remedy.

Mr. President, I say respectfully that either the Allott proposal or the McClellan proposal would make the existing confusion even more confounded. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] that my proposal needs some modifications, although its basic principles are sound.

But if we do not go along with departmentalizing, I propose that the Congress say to the States, "All right; let the States cooperate on this matter, and set up their own agencies to handle these no man's land cases, for the people of the States are entitled to some remedy. So let the States set up their own agencies; and the Federal Government will pay the administrative costs of the States' agencies, when, on the State level, they handle this problem."

I understand that one of the objections to that proposal is made on the basis of the so-called master-servant label which has been attached to this portion of my proposal. But, Mr. President, if the Supreme Court is correct—and I believe it is—in holding that this matter falls within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, then we should be willing to provide that the States should be compensated for this kind of service to the Federal Government.

Therefore, my proposal is that when the State agencies do take jurisdiction, they shall follow Federal standards, in the interest of the equality of justice about which I am talking, so that across the Nation there will be uniformity in connection with the labor-management relationships, so that management in the New England States or management in the Lake States will be subjected to the same principles as those to which management in Mississippi or Texas or Georgia or any other part of the country will be subjected. I think that will be only fair and right.

I also proposed that provision be made for taking an appeal to the courts, but that in the interest of uniformity, the courts shall follow the Federal standards.

Mr. President, if such a program were not followed, the next alternative would be to say that the Federal Government would wash its hands of these cases, and would throw them back to the States, there to be handled either by State agencies or by the State courts. Then what would happen to uniformity of treatment? It would go out the window. I think such an arrangement would result in discriminatory justice, not equal justice. I think it would work a hardship on the employers in what we call the high-labor-standard States, in connection with the entire field of competition. I believe it would be competitively unfair for the Congress to enact, in connection with the no man's land cases, a piece of legislation which would put the employers in some of the States in such a position that higher standards would be applied to them, as compared to others.

That is why I believe the matter of uniform Federal standards is important.

Then, too, if we were to throw these cases into the State courts, we would be subjecting them to the application of common-law doctrines, rather than administrative-law doctrines. In this case we are dealing with a legal subject matter or a field to which—if experience has taught us anything; and certainly it has taught us this—administrative law, not common law, should apply, because if administrative law is not applied to these cases and if the whole body of cases is not handled under the administrative-law principles of the Taft-Hartley Act, but if, instead the no man's land cases are handled variably by State courts, under common-law principles, again the structure of uniformity of justice will be broken down.

That is why we should take a long, hard look at this problem. That is why we should not adopt, today, either the McClellan amendment or the Allott amendment or, I am frank to say, the Morse amendment. In view of the nature of this debate, probably at this time we should not adopt any of them. Instead, we should agree to strike all such provisions from the pending bill; we should pledge, by gentlemen's agreement, that before this session of Congress ends we will come to grips with this no man's land problem, and will give instructions to our so-called blue ribbon committee to speed up its handling of this issue and to bring before us a committee report—with both a majority report and minority views, if necessary, but with a unanimous report, if possible—and then, on the basis of that recommendation, come in with a new bill, and then have the Congress seek to enact such legislation by way of an amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act, because in essence that is what is involved.

Mr. President, I think the highest statesmanship probably calls for the last course of action I have stated.

Mr. President, if we cannot reach an agreement of that sort, then I wish to serve notice now that after we hear from the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], if it is then in order, under the rules of parliamentary procedure, for me to do so at that time, I shall offer another substitute for my own proposal. I do not know what its final form will be, although I have some suggestions. In the meantime, I wish to talk to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], who, along with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], I believe, has been working in the last hour or so on another possible substitute, because the Senator from New York, the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from Oregon, and other members of the committee have worked hard on this matter, in an effort to find some acceptable solution that will keep faith with the principles I have discussed this afternoon.

Mr. President, I fear that if the Senate deals with this matter at this time, here on the floor, as a Committee of the Whole, the result will be an awful mess, whereas if we were to take more time, we could agree to take no action at all on the matter today, but we could pledge to each other that we would take action on it before this session of Congress ends.

It may be that before this session of Congress ends, the special committee will come forward with a proposal which may be at variance with my present point of view, as I am expressing it.

But in this case what I fear is that as a result of the Allott proposal or the McClellan proposal, the Senate will, in effect, be turning the State courts into little Labor Boards, case by case. I say most respectfully that the State courts are not the best tribunals for handling these administrative-law problems. I much prefer a no man's land amendment which will, in the first instance, provide for adjudication before a State administrative-law tribunal. I do not care whether it is called a State industrial relations board, a State adjudication board, or whatnot; I do not care particularly about the name that is used. But I do care very much that these matters be left in the administrative-law field, and not be put into the common-law courts.

I close by saying that the matter involves even injunction proceedings. Have we not learned in 50 years in this country the danger of legislation that seeks to revive the injunctive process for handling these labor problems? My plea is to go slow and let us wait.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I understand, that concludes the 15 minutes which I had under the unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator from Colorado has 15 minutes. If he does not use all that time, perhaps he is willing to yield time to the Senator from Kentucky, or perhaps the Senator from Kentucky can get time on the bill yielded to him.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I wish to support the proposal which the Senator from Oregon has just made. I think the Senate should know this is an important subject. It is one of the most important subjects in the bill which was considered by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. In the committee we studied this problem for days, and tried to arrive at a solution. As the Senator from Oregon has frankly admitted, even the solution we finally agreed to is not the ultimate solution.

It is a fact that, for all practical purposes, there exists a right without a remedy. Although employees and employers, under the Taft-Hartley Act, have a right, they do not have a forum in these cases, because the National Labor Relations Board has declared it cannot take jurisdiction.

There is a provision in the Taft-Hartley Act—section 10(a), I believe—which prescribes that in the event a State has adopted what in effect is a little Taft-Hartley Act, the State agency can take jurisdiction. Only a few States have adopted such laws.

While it may sound reasonable to suggest that the State courts should take jurisdiction, on thought and consideration I think the arguments which the Senator from Oregon has made are compelling. There is a vast body of law involved. Anyone who reads the decisions of the National Labor Relations Board knows how complex the law is. Many of the decisions are reviewed by the courts.

If the proposal of the Senator from Colorado, or that of the Senator from Arkansas were adopted, a great number of employers and employees would be bound by Federal law, the Taft-Hartley Act, and perhaps other employers and employees in the same community would be bound by State law—under entirely different standards. That is not a good thing to do. In my judgment it is not the right thing to do.

My own judgment is that it would be much better if there were State agencies bound by Federal law and having access to Federal courts. Then uniformity would exist.

Unless a solution of that kind can be found, and it is very difficult to find such a solution here on the floor of the Senate, I would approve of the proposal which has been made, namely, that if an agreement can be reached to have this matter studied further, and a solution arrived at before the end of the Congress, it ought to be done.

After a study was made of the question by the committee, I think all of the members came to the conclusion that leaving the question to the State courts and State law was not a proper solution, and that further study of the question was needed.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, so the Senate may be aware of my intentions, I intend to speak only a few minutes. I shall then be happy to yield whatever time is left to Senators who wish to speak in favor of the amendment.

In talking about this matter, I may say that I do not cast any aspersions on either the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Oregon, with both of whom I have pleasurably served on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for a considerable time prior to this year.

I should like to take up, first of all, the question about our wrestling with this problem. We certainly have. We have wrestled with it for several years, that I know of, here in Congress. It seems to me perfectly ridiculous that, after having literally hundreds of drafts of proposed legislation written by individual Members and members of the staff, we must say at this time we cannot come to grips with the question. I would not admit we cannot come to grips with the question on the floor of the Senate right here and at this time. I do not know why we should put off a solution of the question. I think perhaps in the latter part of the afternoon, when perhaps the energy of some of us fails, not enough emphasis is put on the fact that for years gross injustices have taken place, not only in the case of companies, but in the case of working people, and attempts to get their cases heard have failed.

I now wish to take up the chief argument of my friend the Senator from Oregon, namely, the point of uniformity. In fact, everything he has said boils down to the point of uniformity, with one exception, which I shall cover subsequently.

What is the situation? There is a Federal law in existence which takes jurisdiction of labor disputes. A board has been established by Congress, the National Labor Relations Board, to take jurisdiction of those disputes. What happens? A dispute arises, and the National Labor Relations Board says to the disputants, "We do not find that your particular situation is of sufficient interest, or that it affects materially the commerce of this country, so we are not going to take jurisdiction."

Why should not the State courts or the State agencies apply their own law in such instances? The National Labor Relations Board has the opportunity to take jurisdiction of such a case and decide it according to Federal law, if it is a Federal case; but it says it will not do so. When the Board states a case is not of Federal significance and does not come under Federal law, why should not the States take jurisdiction? There simply is not any answer to that question.

I say to the Senator from Oregon, with all respect, if we followed his argument to its ultimate conclusion, on that basis we would have to say there should not be any State courts, because they are not uniform. This is just one segment of the law, one subject matter, out of the great volumes embraced in our law. If we accepted the argument of the Senator from Oregon and carried it to its logical conclusion, we should do away with State courts, and should adopt Federal law and uniform standards on the ground that such cases could not be submitted to the States, whose laws are different.

There are States which have laws having to do with comparative negligence. My own State does not have such a law. Yet thousands and thousands of litigants have gone to court in State tribunals and have had their cases adjudicated. Some cases have been decided under the comparative negligence theory, and some have been decided under different doctrines. The litigants have all obtained justice in their States.

While I must admit that the results might not be exactly the same, at least those people were not left in the woods, whistling for help, looking to Congress for help they would not receive.

It seems to me lack of uniformity is not enough of an argument, because the National Labor Relations Board has said to certain litigants, "You have no Federal interest." When such cases do not involve any Federal interest, why should not the State courts or State boards decide those cases? Why should the States not handle the problems in this area which are basically State problems.

I should like to address myself, finally, to one remark the Senator from Oregon made. The Senator is listening, and I hope I do not misquote him. The Senator said in substance that he would rather see no law on this matter than to see it written in the way we are proceeding.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. Since I am quoting the Senator, I am happy to yield.

Mr. MORSE. I would rather see no law passed this afternoon than any one of the proposals now before us. That is why I wanted to get an agreement among us that we would make this a legislative duty to be taken care of before we leave Washington this year. I certainly join with the Senator from Colorado in wanting some legislation passed, but I would rather have none passed this afternoon than to see enacted any one of the 3 proposals before us.

Mr. ALLOTT. I misunderstood what the Senator said. I would not have made the statement unless the Senator had been here to correct it, if misstated.

Mr. MORSE. I understand.

Mr. ALLOTT. But I do not agree with the Senator. I think it is time to deal with this matter. Of course, the Senator knows as well as I it would be impossible to get an agreement upon the floor of the Senate which would assure that this matter would come up in legislative form this year.

What I am afraid of, Mr. President, is that if we do not act now, while we have the opportunity, we will never act. I therefore, of course, support my amendment.

I will say quite frankly that the McClellan amendment, which I had not seen at the time I started speaking on my own amendment, has some very meritorious provisions in it, in which I intend to join after I have withdrawn by amendment, pursuant to the action I previously took.

If anyone else wishes to be heard on my time, on my side of the fence, I shall be happy to yield to him.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, how many minutes will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, how many minutes do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, we have a condition which is a stench in the nostrils of justice. It has been a stench in the nostrils of justice for years, and the Congress has met time after time and has done nothing to remedy it.

This conditions was brought about by Congress. Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act and took jurisdiction over labor controversies from the States. After Congress set up the National Labor Relations Board, the courts said that since Congress had given jurisdiction over labor controversies, under the Taft-Hartley Act, to the National Labor Relations Board, the State courts could not exercise jurisdiction.

As a result, we have observed people who had legal rights for which they could obtain no remedy. We have observed people suffer labor wrongs for which they could obtain no redress. I say it is a disgrace to any system of law for a person to have rights which cannot be remedied and wrongs which cannot be redressed.

If we do not take action now we do not know when action will will be taken.

The proposal with which I am more familiar is the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. That amendment would merely confer upon the National Labor Relations Board the power to refuse jurisdiction over labor controversies which do not have any substantial impact upon interstate commerce, and to permit jurisdiction over those excluded labor controversies to the courts of justice in the several States.

Mr. President, for years we have had a situation not only in which justice was delayed, but also in which justice was denied. It seems to me we ought to pass a provision similar to that proposed by the distinguished Senator from Colorado or the distinguished Senator from Arkansas; and then, if it is the desire to extend the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board later on, that can be done. Let us not have these people with rights which cannot be remedied and wrongs which cannot be redressed, while we are doing something which may never happen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry as to procedure.

May I have the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], for I want him to consider the procedural question I shall raise.

Would I be in order, Mr. President, to move as a substitute for the McClellan amendment a substitute amendment, or am I estopped from offering a substitute amendment to the McClellan amendment until at least the debate on the McClellan amendment is over, which would be perfectly satisfactory to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute could be offered on any occasion when the Senator could obtain recognition, but the 1 hour time limitation would apply to both.

Mr. MORSE. It leaves me aghast, Mr. President, when I consider how such a unanimous-consent agreement ever was agreed to on the floor of the Senate. This is the last time one like that will be agreed to. I do not intend to ever agree, when I am on the floor of the Senate, to such a unanimous-consent request, because such an agreement is well illustrating its deficiencies and what they are doing to adequate consideration of the pending legislation.

We have before us a complicated problem, Mr. President. And yet there is in the agreement, as I understand it, language which says "or amendments thereto".

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much time does the Senator desire?

Mr. MORSE. What I am trying to find out is, of course, whether I can offer a substitute amendment to the McClellan amendment, or whether I can get recognition by way of a motion to strike.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Presiding Officer has stated that as soon as the Senator is recognized, he can offer an amendment.

Mr. MORSE. I would be limited to the total of 1-hour debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator can obtain unanimous consent to have whatever time he wants, in my opinion. If the Senator will express an idea as to how much time he wants, I will attempt to make that request, or yield the Senator some time on the bill.

Mr. MORSE. I think any unanimous-consent agreement that puts any Senator in the position where he has to come hat in hand asking for unanimous consent to get an extension of a unanimous-consent agreement was badly drafted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No one is looking for a hat or for a hand, either.

If the Senator will indicate the time he wants, we will yield time on the bill.

Mr. MORSE. I will tell the Senator what I want to do. I want to consider the procedural possibilities, first, of offering a substitute for the McClellan amendment, unless we can reach some understanding here. I prefer that we strike the whole section of the bill at the present time and wait for our special committee to bring to the Senate a bill to deal with the no man's land, to see if we can work out an agreement among ourselves that we can act on the matter before the adjournment of this session of Congress, which I think is the most sensible procedure for us to follow. However, if we cannot get any kind of an agreement, then I want to offer a substitute for the McClellan amendment which I am ready to offer.

I want from the Parliamentarian instructions as to how I should proceed to accomplish either one of those purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If additional time is yielded by the Senator in control of the time on the bill, the difficulty might be resolved; or, if unanimous consent is given, additional time may be allowed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I control 1½ hours and the minority leader controls 1½ hours on the bill. We are willing to increase that time with the consent of the Senate, or to yield such portion of it as the Senator feels is necessary to discuss any amendment he cares to offer to the amendment. If the Senator desires the regular 30 minutes which he would have on an ordinary amendment, I shall be glad to yield 30 minutes on the bill.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator should have some time, and I want to see the Senator have time, but I urge that the time should be granted by unanimous consent, so that the Senator may offer a substitute and that we may have 30 minutes for each side on the substitute, rather than yielding time from the time reserved to discuss the bill, because we do not know how important the discussion of the bill may be when we reach that stage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I am sure it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. All we need is a statement as to how much time the Senator wants.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I think it would be better to reserve the very limited time we have on the bill, which is 1½ hours to a side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order for the Senator from Oregon to offer a substitute amendment, and that the Senator may have 30 minutes on the substitute, and that the time in opposition to the substitute be controlled by the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to submit two parliamentary inquiries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state them.

Mr. ALLOTT. The situation is that my amendment, as modified, is still pending, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ALLOTT. It has not been withdrawn. I wish to be sure that I am recognized to withdraw my amendment, in accordance with our previous understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That question will be put immediately after the pending unanimous-consent request is disposed of.

Mr. ALLOTT. The second inquiry, with respect to the majority leader's request, is this: Is it not true that if my amendment is withdrawn and the Senator from Arkansas offers his amendment, the Senator from Oregon can, subsequent to the lapse of time on that amendment, offer any substitute he wishes for that amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. ALLOTT. And have full time on it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. As previously ruled, the time would run both on the amendment and on the substitute.

Mr. ALLOTT. I will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall certainly not object, because I want every Senator who has a good faith amendment, as I am sure the one to be offered will be, to have full time under the agreement—I think we should not follow even the learned suggestions of the Senators from Kentucky and Oregon, and defer action.

In our State we have a situation confronting several thousand hotels which, under the most recent decision of the Supreme Court, do not know where to turn, unless the trouble which affects them comes to violence, when, of course, they can turn to the local officers. But peaceful picketing, which pretty well shuts up their business, can proceed without hindrance from the Federal court or State courts, under the present intolerable situation, which we discussed briefly on the floor the other day.

I hope no Member of the Senate will even seriously consider dropping this discussion if we are to amend the Taft-Hartley Act in connection with the passage of this particular bill. In deference to my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], I believe that everything that has been said in recent minutes by the Senater from Oregon and the Senator from Kentucky demonstrates the wisdom of the proposal of the Senator from North Carolina yesterday to strike out title VI. We did not have a good title VI, and we are barging into provisions which are not well drawn, and which we are not ready to handle.

I am one who believes in standing by the decision of the Senate when made. We must consider the subject matters brought up under title VI. I hope the Senate will not consider leaving to their fate—which is not a good fate—hotels in my State and other States which are left in a very abject condition by the present state of the law.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as of this moment, after consultation, I shall make no unanimous-consent request. I will listen to the Senator from Arkansas. I may make a request later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request was made by the Senator from Texas.

Is there objection?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I do not believe the majority leader heard the remark of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I heard it. The Senator from Oregon says he does not desire time.

Mr. ALLOTT. I did not want the Chair to rule unless the Senator from Texas intended to pursue his request, in the face of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In the light of the statement of the Senator from Oregon, I do not desire to ask for time. He does not desire time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas withdraws his request.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], as modified.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time is left on either side? Does each side have half an hour, or is all the time exhausted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If an amendment is offered, there will be 1 hour.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated. It is designated "4–17–59–B," and I offer it on behalf of the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 54, beginning with line 19, it is proposed to strike out over through line 20 on page 56, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c)(1) Within thirty days after the date of enactment of this subsection, the Board shall clearly establish and publish, by rule or otherwise, such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it proposes to observe for the purpose of excluding from its jurisdiction the classes of labor disputes which, in the opinion of the Board, do not have sufficient effect on commerce to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction.

(2) The Board in the same manner may establish and publish modifications of such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it has established pursuant to paragraph (1), but no such modification shall have the effect of staying or otherwise affecting any proceeding duly instituted before any appropriate court or agency of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands) prior to the expiration of thirty days' publication of such modification; nor shall any such modification permit the Board to withdraw exercise of its jurisdiction over any proceeding which has been duly instituted before the Board prior to the expiration of thirty days' publication of such modification.

(3) In any case or class of cases involving a labor dispute or labor disputes which the Board, pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (2), has excluded from its exercise of jurisdiction, no court or agency of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands) shall be precluded from asserting jurisdiction by virtue of the fact that such case or class of cases involves a labor dispute or labor disputes affecting commerce.

"(4) Any person may petition the Board for a determination as to whether a particular case involving a labor dispute falls within the limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction established pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (2). Notice of such petition and its contents shall be given contemporaneously by the petitioner to any known interested person or his representative, and such notice shall have the effect of staying any proceeding to which the petition refers explicitly, and to which both petitioner and any person or persons given such notice are the parties. Any person given notice may file an answer with the Board not later than ten days after receiving such notice. The Board's determination, unless arbitrary, shall be final and binding upon the petitioner and upon all parties notified by petitioner as provided in this paragraph. If the Board should make no determination within thirty days after the filing of the initial petition, it shall be presumed that the Board has determined to be outside its jurisdiction any case to which the petition explicitly refers, and to which petitioner and any person or persons given appropriate notice are the parties.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT].

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I have already expressed my views with respect to the necessity for action at this time, and I wish to say that those statements apply equally to the amendment which the Senator from Arkansas has just offered. I support it fully. I think it is a better amendment than the one which I originally offered. In my opinion, it would afford relief in a situation which the Senate cannot leave here tonight without taking care of.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

I fully agree with what the distinguished Senator from Florida said a few moments ago. We are forced into this position. If there is something awkward about it, if we are not prepared for it, we are not in that position by reason of any action taken by those of us who sponsor this amendment or those who favor the amendment which I have offered.

I insisted from the beginning, in the consideration of this legislation, that all amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act should be kept from this bill, and that we should have a clean bill dealing with union administration and corruption in the labor movement. I insisted that we should not bring in proposed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act which were known to be controversial.

If we are in the situation of considering something which has not received proper consideration up to this point, it is not the fault of those who are offering this amendment as a substitute for the provision contained in the bill. If there is any failure, if someone has not given to this task the effort it should receive, it is not the fault of those of us who are trying now to amend what has been reported by a duly constituted legislative committee, whose duty it was to study the subject, and not report a measure with which many Senators would be dissatisfied.

The present situation is not our fault. We have the bill on the floor of the Senate. It is a bill which the committee voted to report favorably by a vote of 13 to 2. Those of us who offer this amendment pleaded that no amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act be included in the bill, but that the committee should report a clean bill.

We are asked to delay again. We are asked to enter into some kind of gentlemen's agreement to strike out everything with respect to the no man's land situation, and let that situation continue in the hope that sometime later this session, or some other time, we shall have another bill before us to consider.

We must make up our minds to do one of two things. We can act right now, and we can do it very simply.

There seems to be opposition on the part of those who favor some kind of provision such as that now in the bill, to the State courts having anything to do with cases in which the Federal Government has an interest, and if that interest is not substantial, why not leave the dispute to the State? If there is enough involved, why not compel the National Labor Relations Board to do its duty, to take jurisdiction, and adjudicate the dispute? It is that simple. If those who do not want the State courts to have anything to do with it or exercise any responsibility in the matter, or to provide relief where the situation is practically completely local, they should offer a simple amendment to compel the National Labor Relations Board to take jurisdiction of all cases and to adjudicate them. Perhaps the Board cannot do it. Perhaps it is physically impossible for the Board to do it. However, I will tell the Senate what can be done about it. The Board could be compelled to do it, and Congress could give it the tools with which to do the job.

I do not favor compelling a State to take jurisdiction. Who is to compel a State to do it? The Federal Government cannot set up such an agency in a State. The people involved would still be without a remedy. Who is to set up the State agency?

The whole situation does not make sense to me. If we want it done under Federal law, all we have to do is to require NLRB to take jurisdiction and to give it enough deputies, or whatever is required, to do the job.

That is one direct approach. The other direct approach, if the Federal Government does not have enough basis to justify cases being handled by the Federal Government, is to leave them to the State courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield myself another minute.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I hesitate to transgress on the Senator's time. However, I should like to make an observation on what the Senator has said. I quite agree that we ought to pass legislation which requires the National Labor Relations Board to take jurisdiction. It can do so by forcing it to departmentalize, as I suggested previously. I was not able to get a corporal's guard—if I may be excused the use of that expression—in support of my suggestion. That is the way to do it, Mr. President.

This is not merely the case of a Federal matter being involved. It is a matter of justice. Justice is just as important to 10 or 15 employees of a little plant as it is to 2,000 employees of a great industrial plant across the street from the little plant. The employees in the little plant have the same right to the uniform application of the Interstate Commerce clause as do the 2,000 employees in the big plant. The Board says, "No Federal question is involved. It is only a small plant." That is not the question. If the Board is not going to take jurisdiction, I say we should make it take jurisdiction. If not, then I say we should do it in the way I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield me half a minute?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. We already have in the Taft-Hartley Act a provision to transfer jurisdiction to the States. Several States have set up labor boards which have a so-called little Taft-Hartley Act jurisdiction over certain cases, and they follow Federal standards. That is the situation in a few States, but it is not uniform. I was trying to get in between the two situations. I would say to the State, "We will give you jurisdiction if you follow certain standards, and we will pay the costs of handling the cases."

I thought that would be a pretty fair compromise under all the circumstances. That is the way we drafted the provision. That is what we had in mind. I do not believe it is fair to say to one group of employees under the interstate commerce clause, "We are going to throw you into State courts, under common law procedure, and you will be subjected to the injunctive process," when what we need in this field is administrative law procedure which should be uniform. That is my case.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I urge support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. The argument is irrefutable that when a Federal agency, authorized by Congress to administer the Taft-Hartley Act, declares that a dispute between an employer and a union involving the Taft-Hartley law has such insignificant impact upon interstate commerce that the agency is not justified in acting upon that issue, it impliedly states that it is a matter of State concern. That is the interpretation that I make of the declaration of the Federal agency when it says, "This is a controversy of inconsequential impact upon interstate commerce, and therefore we will not take jurisdiction of it." While it states it has insignificant influence upon interstate commerce, it does not negate the proposition that to the individuals involved within the State it is of great concern.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 more minute?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I do not know how long this no man's land situation has existed, but it has been in existence for some time. In my opinion, it would be a mistake if we did not act upon it. I wish to reiterate what the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has said, and what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] has said, and what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] has said, that if we had voted to strike out title VI, we would not now be in this difficulty. I predict that the weakness of title VI will be manifested with still greater clarity as we proceed in the disposition of the pending bill.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. I believe we are calling this subject by the wrong name. It is called no man's land. It ought to be called no justice land. There is a group of people in this country with respect to whom the National Labor Relations Board denies its jurisdiction, and the courts hold that the Taft-Hartley Act denies jurisdiction to the State courts. It seems to me, although one may be reluctant to yield jurisdiction to the courts of a State, that it is far better to yield the administration of justice to the courts of the States than to yield the administration of justice in this area to nobody and to nothing. That is the position we are in today.

Under the proposal made by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, the courthouse door would be opened to people against whom it has been nailed shut for many years.

Furthermore, we could expand the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board, as the Senator from Oregon has suggested. In the meantime, we would open the courthouse doors to the small union men who have no recourse in seeking relief from the wrongs they have been suffering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the time being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will try to explain briefly why I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Massachusetts yield himself?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 6 minutes. Under the decision in the Guss case, as the Senate knows, it is impossible for a State board or agency to assume jurisdiction in any area which is under the control of the Federal Government, that is, which is in the ambit of the affecting commerce language of the Taft-Hartley Act. It is true that as of today there is a no man's land. This is the way in which the committee intends to fill it. Our bill provides that the National Labor Relations Board shall cede jurisdiction to State agencies which are created for the purpose, and that the State agencies will apply the Taft-Hartley law, with provision for an appeal to the Federal court. Thus we provide that the people shall be given justice. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is accepted, we might have, as in the case today in New York State, a closed shop in one State and in another State—1 of the 12 States which have such laws—a provision under which employees could not picket unless two-thirds of them joined the union.

None of the 12 States have consistent laws. Illinois and many other States do not have State agencies for the purpose of handling labor relation cases. California does not have a State board comparable to the National Labor Relations Board. Neither does the State of Illinois. No provision is made in Florida for elections to be held in order to determine who shall be the proper representatives of employees. So it seems to me that a no man's land remains under this amendment.

The committee has provided that the Taft-Hartley law, which represents the judgment of Congress as to the law which should govern industries in interstate commerce, shall apply across the board. But in order to prevent the backlog of the National Labor Relations Board from piling up too high, we provide that as to the cases which the Board is unable to handle, it can yield jurisdiction to the State agencies, with the right of appeal to the Federal courts.

Contrast that carefully thought out solution with the language proposed by the Senator from Arkansas:

> Within 30 days after the date of enactment of this subsection, the Board shall clearly establish and publish, by rule or otherwise, such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it proposes to observe.

Has there ever been such a cession of authority by the U.S. Congress with respect to interstate commerce as that language proposes, leaving it up to three men, a majority of a five-man board, to determine which employers and employees will be covered by the National Labor Relations Act, and which employers and employees shall be denied the protection of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is that not the way it is done now? That is exactly what the trouble is, and that is what we are complaining about. The employers and employees are being denied the benefit of jurisdiction by the Board.

Mr. KENNEDY. What we intend to do is to fill the vacuum, not to continue it. Only 12 States even have State agencies; therefore, the no man's land would be continued in the remaining 38 States. In 12 States there are completely contradictory laws.

We provide that in those cases in which the National Labor Relations Board cannot assume jurisdiction because of the heavy backlog it may yield jurisdiction to the State agencies, who shall operate under the Taft-Hartley law, but with the right of appeal by the petitioner to the Federal court.

Therefore, to Senators who believe in Taft-Hartley, and who do not agree with the practice in New York State, which permits a closed shop, I say that in 38 States there are no provisions for relief. Under this provision, the no man's land will be continued in 38 States. The only difference is that the law would be uniformly administered under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that the plan of the committee, namely, to make the State labor relations boards the agents of the National Labor Relations Board in the States where State boards exist, is really a system which was used in the case of one of the child labor acts? The Federal enforcement agency delegated to the State departments of labor, which had satisfactory standards, the right to enforce the Federal act. Is that not correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. The Senator from Illinois can tell us whether, if the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is agreed to, there will be any provision in the State law of Illinois for elections to be held.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; there will not.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will not the no man's land continue in the State of Illinois?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct. It would cause us great trouble.

Mr. KENNEDY. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be rejected.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

I say to the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators who may be interested in the subject that we are not proposing to delegate power to the National Labor Relations Board. We are not delegating anything. We are directing the Board to use the power it now has. That is the whole issue. The Board is not doing anything except denying people their rights and their remedies. We are directing the Board to take jurisdiction and to adjudicate.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I wish to read from the hearings before the Subcommittee on Labor of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. This document is on the desk of every Senator. I shall read from page 604 a few remarks by Mr. Leedom, Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, relating to this problem:

> Senator KENNEDY. Perhaps I could start on the question of your budget and your backlog. You could bring me up to date.
> Last year when we considered extending the jurisdiction of the Board's "no man's land," as I remember it, the Labor Committee passed a resolution asking the Appropriations Committee to give you $3 million extra.
> What happened on that?
> Mr. LEEDOM. That's right, sir, and the Congress allowed us that extra money.
> Senator KENNEDY. But they did not give you the additional task?
> Mr. LEEDOM. In line with the proposals we made that if we could get additional money we would extend our jurisdiction, we did that, and since we were last here we adopted new jurisdictional standards which moved the functions of the Board some way into the area we call no man's land.
> We estimated that the new standards which we adopted would increase our then workload by about 20 percent.
> We have been operating under those new standards now for a matter of several months, and while it is too soon to know exactly what we did in the way of increasing our caseload, I would say that the actual experience will pretty well come up to our estimate of the 20 percent increase.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that exhibit 1, appearing on pages 604 and 605 of the hearings, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the exhibit was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT I

STANDARDS ESTABLISHED BY THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD FOR EXERCISE OF FEDERAL JURISDICTION UNDER THE LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947, AS AMENDED

Effective October 2, 1958, the National Labor Relations Board established the following revised standards for determining in which cases it will exercise jurisdiction:

1. Nonretail: $50,000 outflow or inflow, direct or indirect.[1]

(1954: $50,000 outflow, $500,000 inflow, $100,000 indirect outflow, $1 million indirect inflow.)

(1950: $25,000 outflow, $500,000 inflow, $50,000 indirect outflow, $1 million indirect inflow.)

2. Office buildings: Gross revenue of $100,000 of which $25,000 or more is derived from organizations which meet any of the new standards.

(1954: Employer who leases or owns and who operates must be otherwise in commerce and utilize building primarily to house its own offices.)

(1950: $50,000 from tenants in commerce.)

3. Retail concerns: $500,000 gross volume of business.

(1954: Direct inflow of $1 million, or indirect inflow of $2 million or direct outflow of $100,000.)

(1950: Same as nonretail.)

4. Instrumentalities links and channels of interstate commerce: $50,000 from interstate (or linkage) part of enterprise, or from services performed for employers in commerce.

(1954: $100,000.)

(1950: No requirement other than legal jurisdiction.)

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I shall skip along, but I wish to read the following:

On page 607 we find the following:

Senator KENNEDY. With $3 million extra you lowered your coverage, excluding from coverage 29 to 23 percent. But you do not feel that additional appropriations permitting you additional staff would permit you to lower that figure of 23 down further?

Mr. LEEDOM. I think that is right.

On page 608 of the hearings we find that Chairman Leedom said, in answer to a question by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]:

Mr. LEEDOM. Well, I really would prefer not to get into the policy question of whether a bill should be enacted into law that would be in effect the so-called administration bill at this time; that is, providing that where the Labor Board does not assert jurisdiction, States may.

That is a matter of policy. That bill provides one way to handle this thing, I think. The other way—or, at least one other way—would be to try and staff the Labor Board so it could handle all the cases.

I said before and I think it is so now, that this is too gigantic a burden to put on the Labor Board. I think it would reflect badly on the important cases to have us undertake to try all of the little cases.

On page 611 we find the following, in answer to a question by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY]——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why does not the Senator from Arizona read the response made by the Senator from Massachusetts to that statement by Mr. Leedom? I refer to the Senator's suggestion for the setting up of regional boards.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I shall be very happy to read it; but it has already been discussed on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

Mr. DOUGLAS. My good friend the Senator from Arizona is reading various excerpts from the hearings; but he is omitting to read other parts of the hearinsg which are very germane to this issue.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Of course, any Senator can read to the Senate whatever parts of the hearings he may wish to read to this body. A copy of the hearings is on the desk of each Senator. However, I do not believe the portion to which the Senator from Illinois has referred is germane to the argument I am making. The other portion is on page 609; but I do not believe it is pertinent to this presentation.

I am trying to point out that Mr. Leedom does not believe that additional funds or additional staff would accomplish what is sought in connection with this matter; and I am trying to point out the answers which Chairman Leedom gave to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY].

I read further from the statement made by Mr. Leedom:

Mr. LEEDOM. No; I didn't give the Senator the backlog figures at this time but I will be glad to do that.

These are the latest complete figures we have. At the end of December 1958, we had a total of 6,570 cases of all types pending at the various procedural levels.

Of that total figure, 4,930 were unfair labor practices and 1,635 were election cases.

Mr. President, I have read these excerpts; but I have omitted some portions, as the Senator from Illinois has indicated. I have read these excerpts in an effort to call attention to the fact that the National Labor Relations Board does not believe that by increasing its staff it could take care of this case load.

I understand that the 6,570 cases represent about 3 years' work, and that if the Board closed its doors at the present time to any additional cases, it would take the Board 3 years to get caught up.

But, Mr. President, what shall we do in the meantime?

I was very hopeful that the committee would come forward with a satisfactory solution, and also that the blue ribbon commitee would come forward with a satisfactory solution.

I do not suggest that the present proposal of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] is the final solution. On the other hand, if we do not act in this field, we shall deny justice to small companies and small businessmen across the country, and then we shall see them go out of business—a development which will affect labor as badly as it will affect business.

So, Mr. President, instead of throwing up our hands and simply saying, "We have no faith in the State courts," we should recall that, after all, these cases were brought before the State courts before they were brought before the Federal courts. I have confidence in the judicial systems of the States; and I believe that if we turn these disputes over to them, as indicated by the proposal of the Senator from Arkansas, we shall provide relief in this field.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall not go over the ground which already has been covered.

Mr. President, I oppose the proposal of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], because I do not believe it would be sufficiently satisfactory to those concerned to warrant its adoption by the Senate. I do not believe his proposal is workable. I opposed it in the committee.

Instead, I hope we shall proceed on the road to a solution of the problem, after we turn down what is now proposed.

Mr. President, why do I oppose what is now proposed? It is perfectly true that the State courts were formerly the haven in which such practices were dealt with; but that was before there was a body of codified law on the subject, and it was before the States themselves established separate tribunals to deal with these subjects, whereas today 12 of the States have done so. Those States are Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Utah, Wisconsin, Michigan, Colorado, Kansas, Minnesota, and Oregon, as well as Puerto Rico and Hawaii.

I believe that the danger of having the State courts deal with these matters is that they have the injunctive power; and we could not very well deal with limitations on that power of the courts. Hence, the same problem which the Taft-Hartley Act sought to meet and which the Wagner Act sought to meet would be met if we threw the entire caseload into the State courts, those courts being unrestricted in their power, and with injunctive relief, by means of the entire field of injunctions, following almost as surely as the day follows the night. In other words, the varying State court interpretations and all the State court concepts of law are here involved.

I do not believe a sufficient effort has been made—although my predecessor on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, Senator Ives of New York, was a leader in that field—in trying to induce as many States as possible to enter into this field, through the creation of State agencies which would proceed on the basis of the administrative management of law in the States.

The approach made by Senator Ives was to seek agreement between State agencies and the National Labor Relations Board, in order to shift to State agencies the handling of all cases which the National Labor Relations Board itself could not handle. That is essentially the approach that is made in the section of the bill we are now considering.

I believe the real difficulty in that connection is that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to persuade any State to adopt the servant-master relationship which that approach implies, and to accept a jurisdiction in which it would be under the general surveillance of a Federal body which, in a way, could take jurisdiction of such State agencies and generally could treat them as branch offices. That would be asking too much of the State agencies, and I do not think that would happen.

The alternative which we might take is as follows: We could give such States as would choose to set up such agencies the right to accept the jurisdiction of these cases, provided we bound them to the rule of following the Federal statutes as well as the Federal court interpretations. That could be done under the established doctrine of Erie versus Tompkins, which long antedates any of this law, and which holds that any court will seek to apply Federal law according to the interpretations made by the Federal courts.

In that event, although it is true that we would start with only 12 States, we would relieve them of the indignity of being servants of the National Labor Relations Board; but at the same time we would invite them to use their own State courts; and any State would be free to do so.

Mr. President, in that case the dignity of the States and their courts would be maintained, as it is under present circumstances; and we would not run the risk of having these cases dealt with in accordance with State law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield 1 more minute to me?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, as I understand the situation, what I have stated is about all we can do in this connection, until the so-called blue-ribbon committee brings forth a studied, carefully worked-out solution.

So, I oppose the pending amendment, because I do not think it is a solution. Likewise, I do not think a solution of this problem is contained in the bill.

I am prepared to offer an alternative for discussion. Or perhaps another alternative will be made available.

But certainly the two alternatives which now are before us do not meet the issue.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time remains to our side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back all but 5 minutes of the time remaining under my control.

How much time remains under the control of the Senator from Arkansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has 12 minutes remaining to him.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back all the time remaining to me but 4 minutes, if the Senator from Arkansas is prepared to yield back the time remaining to him.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether he is going to request the yeas and nays?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I request the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I withdraw my offer to yield back the time remaining to me. I think the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is to speak, then I will speak, and the Senator from Arkansas will then conclude the discussion.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak on this complex subject, because I know that those who have studied it more fully than those who are not involved in the committee should have better answers to the problem than we can give; but I am impressed by the fact that has come out, as was mentioned in the debate, that the specific committee charged with arriving at a solution has not done so.

With his characteristic candor—and I have always particularly honored the Senator from Oregon because he has always been candid—he has stated to us that, although he is, in a sense, the father of the present provision in the bill dealing with this subject, he is not satisfied with it, he does not think it should be enacted into law, and he has another provision which he thinks will more adequately deal with the situation.

We are confronted with a fact, and not a theory. In every State of the Union there are hotels. Let me speak for the moment about hotels alone, although there are many, many other enterprises which are affected. Hotels happen to be peculiarly vulnerable to picketing. More particularly is that true of resort hotels. We have had to put up with picketing, not on account of employees who were already in labor unions, but generally in an effort to force the organization of unwilling employees, who did not want to belong to labor unions.

To avert the catastrophe which the hotel owners were facing, the State courts enjoined that type of picketing. Only recently the Supreme Court has held that State courts cannot any longer exercise that jurisdiction, and, to the contrary, it has not said that the National Labor Relations Board has jurisdiction or does not have jurisdiction, but it has come up with one of those enigmatic smiles, such as appears on the face of a sphinx, and has said, "We hold that the National Labor Relations Board cannot deny the exercise of jurisdiction simply on the ground stated in the cases," which was simply that it was the long-standing practice of the National Labor Relations Board not to take jurisdiction in certain cases.

Mr. President, I suspect that is a sound ruling, but the NLRB rulings and decisions before that time were made on findings that insubstantial amounts of interstate commerce were involved in the transactions, and, because the amounts of interstate commerce were inconsequential, no jurisdiction was asserted.

Mr. President, have we come to the time when every business within every State of the Union is going to be under the regimentation of another arm of the Federal Government, which has already shown how ineffectively it asserts itself in this field?

Are we going to have the kind of situation which the chairman of the National Labor Relations Board reminded the very committee hearing this matter would exist, namely, that it would require an army of employees and a vastly enlarged board to handle the cases?

If Senators wish to construct some more Pentagons, here is an opportunity, and here is a bureau which will require one, if it goes into that field. And if it does, the procedure will involve delays of the kind that destroy business.

Mr. President, when are we going to reach the time when we recognize that the enforcement of laws for the protection of individuals and property rights in State courts has been going on for a long time, and that, under the Federal Constitution and the State constitutions, we have reserved to the States a vast number of problems on which the States must pass, important matters involving questions of life and death, and complete destruction of property, and other matters of the very gravest consequence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 1 more minute to me?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, last year we raised the limit of jurisdiction in diverse citizenship cases in an effort to force more suits, instead of fewer, into the jurisdiction of State courts. Here we are confronted with a situation under which Senators who drafted the provisions say it is inadequate. I respect the Senator from New York for his candor, because he has sat in the committee. Title VI was retained when the committee had an opportunity to knock it out of the bill.

Mr. President, there is also involved a critical situation affecting thousands of enterprises throughout the Nation, and members of the committee are perfectly willing to leave the bill in such condition that they know there cannot be any enforcement of the law, because they know the National Labor Relations Board, be it of any size Congress might fix, simply could not keep up with as great a caseload as the combined business enterprises of our Nation would present.

I think the situation is ridiculous. I hope the Senate adopts the affirmative proposal offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I do not want to restate my case. I wish to quote from the testimony of Mr. Benetar, chairman of the committee on labor-management relations of the New York Chamber of Commerce:

> The proposals or the majority of proposals before your committee would automatically let the States step in wherever the National Board declines to act, but would let them step in to act on their own terms, which means that the proposals before you are proposals to reverse the policy of the national law and, instead of having a no man's land, to have an every man's land with 48 States regulating federally covered employees and employers in 48 ways, if they so desire.

The Senate, by a two-thirds vote, supported the Taft-Hartley Act in 1952. I think employers and employees engaged in interstate commerce should be under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. In the State of New York, as Mr. Beneter has pointed out, there are no laws governing unfair labor practices for employees. There are no procedures in 38 States governing elections, which is one of the basic causes of industrial disputes. Who is to be the bargaining agent? There are no regulations relating to picketing in some States. In others, there is a requirement of a two-thirds vote before there can be picketing.

It seems to me the proposal would yield jurisdiction over an area which is interstate commerce, which would permit States to enact their own legislation, even though only 12 have done so. There will be no general rules for procedure, and no standards for the National Labor Relations Board to determine where jurisdiction should lie. So if the amendment were accepted, the National Labor Relations Board could accept any standards it desired. Members of the three-man Board would determine which employers or employees were affected. We would not have solved the no man's land problem. We would have provided that a State agency can appeal a Federal law or appeal to a Federal court in cases that go to Federal courts.

If the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is rejected, I am prepared to accept some language which would be somewhat closer to that suggested by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from New York.

I think the first step is to defeat this provision, which I think would be inimical to the general welfare.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield myself the rest of such time as I have remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back whatever time I have remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, not by choice and not by any action of mine, but by circumstances I find myself on this floor repeatedly, in the process of this debate, pleading for the oppressed and pleading for those who have rights which are not secured to them. I find myself pleading for those who seek relief from their Government, from conditions which are intolerable, for which there is no excuse in a great Republic and under a great Government like ours. Thousands upon thousands of businesses and thousands upon thousands of workers are left without a tribunal to adjudicate their grievances, yet we are asked tonight to do nothing about it. We are asked to do nothing about it, or to do worse. Thirty-eight of the States and the Territories have no provision for action and have no law which would enable them to comply with or to function under the language reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Let me point out again that Senators should not be misled by the statement that we are yielding jurisdiction to the States. We are not yielding anything to the States. The National Labor Relations Board now has jurisdiction, if it will take it. The Board has the jurisdiction. We have given it to the Board.

Who is causing the oppression? The National Labor Relations Board. Why? Because we put a burden on it which is impossible to fulfill. Why? Because we do not want to let the States deal with the little affairs which are primarily their business.

Since when have we lost complete confidence in the sovereignty and integrity of the States? It is said that this field is too trifling for the Federal Government to deal with. We have before us the absolute evidence that if the Federal Government undertakes to do the job, it will cost tremendous amounts of money. It will be necessary to establish new boards to do this, and to do that, because it is physically impossible for the National Labor Relations Board to do it all.

What are we asked to do? We are asked to go through a backdoor process. We are not giving any jurisdiction to the States under the proposal in the bill. What we are doing is trying to beg the States to set up an agency to turn over to the Federal Government, which would have to do things as the Federal Government might direct. I do not think a State which has available the necessary brainpower will do it. I do not think the States will want to do it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the Federal Government is to have jurisdiction, if the Federal Government is to have sovereignty, and if the Federal Government is to have the final say, let the Federal Government start with the case, handle it all the way through, complete it and finish it.

I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it should be emphasized that before this provision ever comes into play, there must be a finding in such cases that there is no burden on commerce.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. These are the little cases involving a small number of employees, such as the blueprint case out in Utah, which gave rise to this question in the first place. Only a handful of employees were involved.

If the State adminstrative bodies and courts cannot take care of those cases, it is a sad commentary upon the administration of equitable practices at the State level.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is a sad commentary, indeed, and a reflection on our system of government.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There is no doubt about it. Either we must have a centralized Government with all power in Washington, D.C., in a little board, or only a few officials, or the States must be trusted.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thought last night that we put the Federal Government squarely into the life of every union member in the United States.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; we did.

Mr. KENNEDY. Now we hear that we should leave the field to the States, because it happens in this case that uniform rights to working people all over this country are denied.

Mr. McCLELLAN. We did that, because the Federal Government had taken jurisdiction all over the country. Now the Federal Government has taken jurisdiction and will not use it. I say the Federal Government should make its choice. It should either use the jurisdiction it has or should turn it back to the States. The question is that simple.

Surely, if the Federal Government is to take charge, we ought to legislate to protect those who are to be taken charge of. That is what we did last night. We acted to protect those of whom the Federal Government has taken charge. The Federal Government had placed the power in the hands of a few officers, to dictate to those subject to their jurisdiction by a rule of fear, by a rule of intimidation, by a rule of force and by a rule of violence.

Mr. President, we stepped in last night and said that the same Federal Government owes these people protection. I thank God enough Members of the Senate had the courage to vote for the amendment.

I am ready to face the world and say that in that vote I voted for the poor, downtrodden, helpless, dues-paying member who could not help himself, unless his Federal Government gave him relief.

Mr. President, I am simply asking that the Federal Government do its duty and take jurisdiction and adjudicate, or leave to the States a jurisdiction under which the people can obtain relief. We must do one of two things.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARTKE (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]. I am informed that if he were present and voting he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was resumed and concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

If present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "nay," and the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay," and the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is absent on official business. As previously announced the Senator from Wisconsin is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea," and the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is detained on official business, and is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea," and the Senator from New Mexico would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. MCCLELLAN'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 54, line 17, it is proposed to strike out all of section 601 and insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 601. Section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following new subsection as follows:

"(c) (1) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as to prevent any State or Territorial agency other than a court, from exercising jurisdiction over all cases which the Board has jurisdiction, but by rule or otherwise, has declined to assert jurisdiction; Provided, That the State or Territorial agency shall apply and be governed solely by Federal law as set forth in section 8(a) and 8(b), and 9 in this Act, as the case may be, and Board and Federal Court rules of decision construing said Sections 8(a), 8(b), and 9. Injunctive relief under sections 10(j) and 10(l) shall be available to such agency. Provided that no petition under Section 10(j) shall be filed unless it has been expressly approved by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

"(c) (2) The State or Territorial agency may petition any district court of the United States within such State or Territory for the enforcement of a final order of such agency and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Such court shall make and enter an order or decree enforcing, modifying, enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of such agency.

"(c) (3) Any person aggrieved by a final order of the State or Territorial agency granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in a district court of the United States in such State or Territory. Upon such filing, such district court shall proceed in the same manner, and have the same jurisdiction, as in the case of an application for enforcement under section (c) (2)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Kentucky yield himself?

Mr. COOPER. I yield myself 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention, if I may, of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], and all other Senators who are interested in the subject we have just been debating. I should like to say also that I am joined in offering the amendment by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, may we have order? I should like to listen to the distinguished Senator tell us what the difference is between what he proposes and what is now in the bill.

Mr. COOPER. I shall explain it. There is a difference.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I am trying to get order so that I can hear the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. What I said previously on this subject was misinterpreted or misquoted. It has been stated that I said in my argument that I wanted this question postponed. That is not exactly what I said. I said that rather than adopt the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, I would prefer to see the consideration of the subject postponed. I went on to say, however, that I should like to see a remedy which would provide for an agency of the State government to assume jurisdiction.

This is not a sudden thought on my part. In our deliberations in committee I offered the amendment. It should not have been defeated, but it was defeated. However, many members of the committee voted in favor of it. They will remember the amendment I offered in committee.

I do not wish to repeat in detail what I said about the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. But the point of my opposition, and the opposition expressed by other Senators, was that if it had been adopted, we would have had a number of labor laws dealing with disputes which arose out of interstate commerce. We would, first of all, have had a labor law for disputes over which the NLRB takes jurisdiction. Then, in every State, according to State law, there could have been different decisions for disputes which NLRB denied jurisdiction. In some States there would be no law at all to deal with such disputes.

The amendment which I offered in committee, and which I offer now in the Senate, joined by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], provides a remedy. Let me make that clear. It provides that if the State has an agency or wishes to establish an agency to deal with its own cases, there will be a forum in which those disputes can be adjudicated.

It was said in the argument that the burden is upon Congress to do something about this problem. I agree. But, if we provide an opportunity for a forum, then the burden shall shift to the States to provide for a forum to adjudicate the disputes. So the first thing my amendment does is to provide that an agency of a State may determine these disputes.

The second provision, and one which meets the issue of uniformity, is that the State agency would follow the Federal law, the Taft-Hartley Act. Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act and placed within its bounds all disputes arising out of interstate commerce. So this amendment would not change the law; it would follow the law.

The third provision in the amendment is that all decisions made by the State agencies would be subject to review by the Federal courts. So there would be a complete remedy for cases over which the NLRB cannot take jurisdiction.

The Senator from Arkansas asked, How does this amendment differ from section 601 in the bill? It differs in at least four particulars. Section 601 of the bill provides that the Board may delegate jurisdiction to a State agency.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator mean a State agency other than a State court?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. The State court is persona non grata in this field.

Mr. COOPER. That was just decided by the vote a few minutes ago.

The question was asked, How does this amendment differ from section 601 of the bill? I do not think section 601 would have any efficacy as it is now in the bill, because even though it provides that a State agency shall have jurisdiction, it would permit the NLRB to withdraw jurisdiction from the State agency.

The amendment I have offered would assure that once the State agency had assumed jurisdiction, it would have complete jurisdiction for all purposes, and the jurisdiction could not be withdrawn by the NLRB. That is the first difference.

The second difference is that the first method of appeal provided in section 601 of the bill is to the Board itself. The amendment I have offered provides only one route of appeal—to the courts.

There is an even further difference.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator from Kentucky make clear what court he is talking about?

Mr. COOPER. The Federal court. So there is the distinct difference that absolute jurisdiction is given to the States if they will provide the forum; and they will not be in any way creatures of the National Labor Relations Board, which is the situation which would exist if section 601 remains in the bill and is enacted.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The important thing is that the amendment is prospective in its application. It is not confined to the 12 States, Hawaii, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; it can extend to every State in the Union which qualifies itself by establishing an agency.

Mr. COOPER. All a State has to do is to establish an agency. The present law is that even if there is a State agency, the agency cannot exist unless there is a State law similar to the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to inquire whether a copy of this amendment is available. I have searched throughout the Senate for a copy of it. I have heard all afternoon the cries of Senators who say that Congress cannot legislate upon this subject because it is too important and it has not been given sufficient consideration. Now we are asked to consider an amendment which is completely different. I have just now received a copy of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. COOPER. How much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER. I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina will state it.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senate has been in session for 10 hours, lacking 5 minutes. I should like to know if it is in order for me to move that action on this amendment be deferred until the amendment has been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order for the Senator to make such a motion, if the Senator from Kentucky were to yield for that purpose.

Mr. COOPER. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, a point of order. The Senator from Kentucky yielded to me for a question. I assert my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor. He may yield to any Senator to whom he wishes to yield.

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I have just been handed a copy of the amendment which the Senator from Kentucky offered. This subject has been under discussion in the Senate since 4 o'clock this afternoon. Now I have in my hand a completely new approach to the problem. I think it is time to discuss it.

Does not the Senator from Kentucky believe this amendment should lie on the desk until tomorow morning, and be printed so that Senators may have time and opportunity to examine it, discuss it, study it, and formulate their arguments for or against it?

Mr. COOPER. If the Senate recesses, yes; but if the Senate is not to recess now, that will be impossible.

Mr. ALLOTT. I do not know that it is impossible if we vote on the question.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me to allow me to offer an amendment to lie on the table and be printed?

Mr. COOPER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed, and will lie on the table.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I respectfully suggest that this is a very complicated subject. We have been debating various versions of it. I suggest that the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his amendment at this time and let it lie on the desk and be printed, so that copies of it may be available tomorrow morning. It is obvious that action on the bill will not be concluded tonight. If we can see the amendment in printed form tomorrow, we shall know what we are talking about.

Mr. COOPER. I am perfectly willing at this time to withdraw my amendment, in which I was joined by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], so that it may be printed for the benefit of all Senators, if it can be considered tomorrow.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, does such action require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not require unanimous consent, unless the Senator desires to obtain additional time.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield half a minute to me?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I join with the Senator from Kentucky in his proposal to withdraw the amendment until it can be printed. I am a cosponsor of the amendment. The Senator from Kentucky told the Senate that when his amendment was before the committee, the committee finally decided not to adopt the amendment. I told the Senator from Kentucky that I thought there was great merit in his amendment and that perhaps we could arrive at an agreement with respect to it on the floor of the Senate if necessary.

I think this is a sound and sensible solution of this very difficult problem, until the special committee later comes forward with an amendment to the part of the Taft-Hartley Act which deals with this subject.

In the meantime, I believe the pending amendment should be withdrawn.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair). The Senator from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. COOPER. If I now withdraw the amendment, will I be allowed to discuss it for half an hour longer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senator will have a total of 1 hour for his discussion of the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is withdrawn.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. I call attention to the fact that I have prepared an amendment, which will be printed tonight, and will be available in the morning—although possibly it is available now. My amendment represents a compromise between the two extremes—namely the amendment of the Senators from Arkansas and the amendment which a few minutes ago was offered by the Senator from Kentucky. I hope the Members of the Senate will take the time to read that amendment, too.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Let me ask the Senator from Vermont whether, under his amendment, such cases as are now before the Board would come under the jurisdiction of the State courts; or whether, as in the case of the Cooper amendment, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont would circumvent the State courts, and would send such cases directly to the Federal courts.

Mr. PROUTY. No; that would not be the case under my amendment. Under my amendment, the State courts would be in the picture.

Mr. MUNDT. I think that is important, because I do not know of any case in which the decision of such a government agency would go directly to the Federal courts, without the State courts first having an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is identified as "4–22–59—B."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 35, between lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 207. (a) It shall be the duty of the secretary or other corresponding officer (or if there is no such corresponding officer, the president) of each labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, in the case of a local labor organization, to forward a copy of each collective bargaining agreement made by such labor organization with any employer to any employee who requests such a copy and whose rights as such employee are directly affected by such agreement, and in the case of a national or international labor organization, to forward a copy of any such agreement to each constituent unit which has members directly affected by such agreement; and such officer shall maintain at the principal place of business of the labor organization of which he is an officer copies of any such agreement made or received by such labor organization, which copies shall be available for inspection by any member or by any employee whose rights are affected by such agreement.

(b) Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes; and then I shall yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I should like to point out what this amendment provides. I believe it will be accepted by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

I can state very simply what the amendment would do. It would provide that any union member shall, upon request, be provided with a copy of any bargaining agreement affecting him. That is all the amendment amounts to. In my opinion, the union members are entitled to that. The law provides that, upon request, they shall receive a copy of such a bargaining agreement.

In the past, some extreme proposals in this field have been made. Perhaps I, myself, submitted one; as I recall, I did submit one in connection with the previous bill. But I agree that, upon request, union members should be supplied with copies of the agreements.

I believe it sufficient to provide that they are entitled to them, and that, upon request, they shall be supplied with them, because they are entitled to know the terms of the contracts under which they are working, under which they have rights, and under which their wages, working conditions, and so forth, are defined.

So I hope the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I think the amendment is a useful one; and I accept it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield back all time which remains under my control.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back all time which remains under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up an amendment which I have sent to the desk. The amendment does not have a number; but it is the one I have just handed to the clerk. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 42, in line 7, it is proposed to insert "(1)" after "(a)."

On page 42, line 13, it is proposed to insert "was either convicted of, or" after "he."

On page 42, line 14, it is proposed to insert ", any of the following crimes committed prior to the date of enactment of this Act," after "of."

On page 42, line 17, it is proposed to strike out "or."

On page 42, beginning with the word "unless" in line 18, it is proposed to strike out all through "Act" in line 22.

On page 42, line 18, it is proposed to strike out the comma after "crimes" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "; and (2) no person shall serve as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, organizer, or other employee of a labor organization (other than an employee performing exclusively clerical or custodial duties) engaged in an industry affecting commerce, if within five years preceding such service he was either convicted of, or served any part of a prison term resulting from his having been convicted of, any of the following crimes committed on or after the date of enactment of this Act: robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, violation of narcotics law, murder, rape, assault with intent to kill, assault with intent to inflict grievous bodily injury, or conspiracy to commit any of such crimes."

On page 43, beginning with the word "or" in line 24, it is proposed to strike out all through line 25, and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", except that if, in the case of any person, such judgment is reversed on appeal, such person shall not, after the date of such reversal, be deemed to have been 'convicted' or under the disability of 'conviction'."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the pending bill contains some provisions which would be amended by this amendment. The amendment would simply strengthen the bill. I think my distinguished friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, is willing to accept the amendment, after having considered it.

Mr. President, we have found that a few unions—let us put the matter in that way—seem to prefer, for certain official positions, to appoint men who have had criminal experience, particularly those who have proven to be proficient in crimes of violence, thievery, and skullduggery.

In this amendment, we provide that such persons who have been convicted of the crimes enumerated in the amendment shall be ineligible to hold office in a union—either by election or otherwise—for 5 years from the date when they finished serving their sentence, or for 5 years from the date of conviction, if they did not serve a sentence.

Sometimes they are convicted, and are put on probation, as we know—but for 5 years from the date of their conviction, if they are put on probation, or for 5 years from the time when they finish serving their sentence or from the time when they were released from prison, if they actually were sent to prison, they would be ineligible.

I hope the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts will accept the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I understand that the words "moral turpitude" have been eliminated from the amendment. Those words are too general.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, let me ask whether, in the copy of the amendment I have sent to the desk, those words have been stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that they have not been stricken from the amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may modify the amendment by striking out the words "moral turpitude." I strike them out of the amendment because in some instances they might apply to those who have been convicted of having committed petty crimes; and of course that is not the purpose. Instead, the purpose is to have the amendment apply to those who have shown definite criminal tendencies.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, with that modification, the amendment is acceptable; and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time available to me; and I hope the amendment, as modified, will be agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Do I correctly understand that the amendment has now been modified in the way indicated?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Has the Senator's amendment been printed?

Mr. McCLELLAN. No; it has not been printed; it is the only one I have submitted which has not yet been printed. I intended to file it today; but a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into. I shall hand a copy of the amendment to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I ask the question because I have prepared an amendment to the same section of the bill. My amendment approaches the same problem, I believe, although in a somewhat different way. I am not sure as to that.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I shall give the Senator from South Dakota an opportunity to read my amendment, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. MUNDT. Very well.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In the meantime, I shall speak for a minute or two about the progress we are making on the bill.

Mr. President, if we continue to proceed in the way we have—although the Senate has rejected one amendment which I think should have been adopted—I believe we shall continue to make real progress. I believe we are showing the country that we can improve the bill by debating it and by proceeding in the way we have done. I believe we are establishing beyond peradventure of doubt that the bill needed some amendment; and I believe that the debate and the votes which have been taken are serving the welfare of the working people of the country, and, on the other hand, are not very helpful to the crooks and scoundrels we are trying to drive out of the union movement in the country.

Mr. President, as soon as my distinguished friend the Senator from South Dakota completes his examination of my amendment, I hope he will agree that it is an improvement over the corresponding provisions of the bill; and I hope he will support the amendment.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator's amendment—now that I have had an opportunity to examine it—it eliminates from the Kennedy-Ervin bill provision for the Secretary of Labor to have authority to pass upon the question of whether a man is an appropriate risk to hold a union office.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct. I thought that provision should be eliminated from the bill; and we have undertaken to do so.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I have approached the matter in a somewhat different way, by means of an amendment which I propose to submit. My amendment is identified as "4–21–59—C." It would eliminate, on page 42, in line 12, the words "within 5 years," because it seemed to me that there have been before our committee cases in which some of the worst crooks with whom we have had to deal have been out of the "big house" for more than 5 years, and, with the aid of dexterous legal talent, have been able to stay out; but they are the kind of people whom neither the chairman of the committee nor I would like to see hold union office.

Does the Senator from Arkansas believe that this language would protect us against such a situation?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It would protect us for 5 years. Of course, we could not be sure that such men had reformed at the end of 5 years; but for 5 years we would have protection.

Of course, there is always the desire, at least, and the hope that criminals will reform. Some of them have gone so far and have become such habitual criminals that I think there is little or no hope for them. But at least for 5 years, even for the first offense, they would not be able to serve as union officers, under this language.

Mr. MUNDT. I was about to try to approach that problem because I share, with the Senator, hope for the salvation and reformation of those who have been convicted. We all know of some persons who have been incarcerated and have made an honest reformation. Having done so, they should be given their full rights and privileges to serve as union officers.

I rather thought if persons had had their citizenship rights restored, that would be an adequate demonstration of their character and their capacity to hold a union office. Perhaps by striking out the period of 5 years, we would be arriving at the same goal.

If the Senator feels this language will do the job, without doing an injustice to an individual who has been in a penitentiary and who makes an honest reformation and works his way back into decent society, I believe what the Senator has suggested would tighten somewhat the language of the Kennedy-Ervin bill, and I shall support it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I hope the Senator will support the amendment. I do not know whether I was the first one who suggested it, but I remember that early in our hearings we discussed this evil practice, which prevailed in some unions. I am sure the Senator agreed with me, either privately or publicly, that the problem needed legislative treatment, so that criminals would not be placed in authority and power over working people.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is correct. He may recall that when the Kennedy-Ives bill was before the Senate a year ago, I offered an amendment covering this subject, which was adopted unanimously by the Senate in a yea-and-nay vote. The committee had weakened that provision somewhat, I felt, by putting in the 5-year provision and the other provision which the amendment of the Senator strikes out.

Because I believe the Senator's amendment strengthens the committee version, I see no reason why the amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "4–17–59–AA."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 51, between lines 11 and 12, to add the following new subsection:

(k) "Labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant" means any person who, for compensation, advises or represents an employer, employer organization, or labor organization concerning employee organizing, concerted activities, or collective bargaining activities, but shall not include a director, officer or regular employee of such employer, employer organization or labor organization, or an attorney engaged in the practice of law.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I modify my amendment by striking on page 2, line 2, all following the word "organization" as it appears the second time in that sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to modify his own amendment. Does the Senator have a modified copy to send to the desk?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe the clerk can follow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well.

Mr. GOLDWATER. On line 2, page 2, strike out all following the second appearance of the word "organization." That is strike out the words "or an attorney engaged in the practice of law." Then place a period after the second "organization."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has now been modified.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I will say to my friend from Massachusetts, with whom I have discussed this amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

The bill as it now stands has many references to a labor relations consultant, and yet in the section of definitions there is no reference to a labor relations consultant. My amendment would merely supply that definition.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand, the Senator wishes to add a definition. Will the Senator read the language?

Mr. GOLDWATER. My amendment would read, as I have modified it: on page 51, between lines 11 and 12 add the folowing new subsection:

(k) "Labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant" means any person who, for compensation, advises or represents an employer, employer organization, or labor organization concerning employee organizing, concerted activities, or collective bargaining activities, but shall not include a director, officer or regular employee of such employer, employer organization or labor organization.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask the Senator who would be a labor relations consultant of a labor organization? Can the Senator give an example?

Mr. GOLDWATER. He would be either a man working for a company in this capacity or a man who is in the business of a labor relations expert who might be hired by a smaller firm. It would not include an attorney engaged in the practice of law.

Mr. KENNEDY. What effect would the Senator's amendment have on the requirement that attorneys be subject to the law when they are acting as labor relations consultants?

Mr. GOLDWATER. They would be subject to the law.

Mr. KENNEDY. In other words, the language would not affect the attorney relationship, when the attorney was acting as a labor relations consultant.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator discuss the attorney-client relationship with respect to this amendment, or the next amendment?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That will be the next amendment, I will say to my friend.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask the Senator if he can tell me what the practical effect of the amendment is. I am anxious to accept the Senator's amendment. I merely wish to be sure we understand what we are accepting. In what way would the language of the bill as it now stands be subject to question, and therefore in what way would the Senator's amendment clarify it?

Mr. GOLDWATER. There is no definition of a labor relations consultant in the bill, even though the bill refers to it in several instances. It was thought, because we referred to a labor relations consultant, that we had better have a definiton of it. The definition I have supplied in my amendment would cover those who would be affected under the term "labor relations consultant.'

Mr. KENNEDY. On page 24, section 203(a) the bill reads, in part:

It shall be unlawful for any employer or any person who acts as a labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant to an employer—

That is the section which deals with the labor relations consultant, to whom the Senator is now referring.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not see any reference to a labor relations consultant for a labor organization. It seems to me this language comes from the New York statute, and there may be some reference in the New York statute to a labor relations consultant in a labor organization, but the language appears to be either redundant or meaningless. I never heard of a labor relations consultant in a labor organization, unless we are talking about an attorney who works as an adviser. What we are really talking about in this language is the middleman.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am advised by my attorney that Mr. John Steelman would be an example in point. He is now serving as a labor relations consultant. I have numerous friends in the industry who are practicing in this particular field.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the time be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has been yielded back.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I call up my amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section 607, to read as follows:

SEC. 607. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(e) It shall be an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer who is a common carrier subject to Part II of the Interstate Commerce Act to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling or transporting any of the products of any other employer."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator yield to himself?

Mr. GORE. I yield myself such time as I may require, Mr. President.

Mr. President, under the terms of the Interstate Commerce Act, a common carrier obtains permission from the Government to operate a common carrier service over a given route. He not only obtains permission, but he obtains a franchise, which is a valuable right, to serve the public on the general route encompassed within the franchise.

It seems to me it would be contrary to the public interest for such a common carrier to enter into a contract to refuse to deliver goods to certain employers. This would be discrimination. This would place an unfair weapon in the hands of those empowered to use it. I think it should be an unfair labor practice. It would be a restraint of trade. When practiced, the use of a privilege or right granted by the Government in such a manner would be discrimination against certain citizens and would be the practice of force and coercion. It would be use of a privilege granted by the Government for purposes which are subject to question.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Tennessee is discussing an extremely important question. I believe the Senator is rendering a great public service by raising this question.

As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, the effect of the amendment would be to outlaw the so-called hot cargo agreement, which has been one of the means by which the Teamsters' Union has expanded its power. The way the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is drafted, I believe it would not only prevent the Teamsters from picketing to enforce a hot cargo agreement, but also would prevent them from persuading other employers to refuse to handle goods as a part of a general agreement with them.

Under the present law the Teamsters could not picket to enforce a hot cargo agreement, but under the present law they could make an agreement, if they did not picket. Under the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, the Teamsters could not picket to enforce an agreement and entering into an agreement would be made an unfair labor practice, so that the Teamsters would not be able to persuade other employers, as a part of the general agreement with them, to refuse to handle goods from another employer who might be engaged in an economic dispute with a union.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct.

The able junior Senator from Massachusetts has done a commendable, able, and effective job in the handling of the bill. Unless some restraint and protection were provided, the Teamsters Union, with all its vast power, could, in concert or conspiracy with a common carrier having an exclusive franchise, seize the jugular vein not only of an employer but also of another labor union. By this method it can not only coerce an employer but also raid the employees of another union. I hope the Senator will accept the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am delighted that the Senator has offered the amendment. It is extremely important. It supplements the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in attempting to control the effect of hot cargo agreements. I am hopeful that the Senate will see fit to adopt it. I know it has been a matter of the greatest possible interest to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to have a brief explanation of the Senator's amendment. I have a similar amendment on the desk, and I should like to determine whether the Senator's amendment would do the job that my amendment is intended to do. If so, I shall not offer my amendment.

Mr. GORE. At the end of the bill I would add a new section 607, to read as follows:

SEC. 607. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end of a new subsection as follows:

"(e) It shall be an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer who is a common carrier subject to Part II of the Interstate Commerce Act to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling or transporting any of the products of any other employer."

Mr. McCLELLAN. The amendment is satisfactory, and it covers many of the things I had in mind. However, I suggest this addition to it:

For the purposes of this section "labor organization engaged in activities affecting commerce" means a labor organization which has officers or members engaged in activities affecting interstate commerce, or which represents employees engaged in such activities, or which represents employees or has officers or members who are employed by an employer or in any industry engaged in activities affecting interstate commerce—

And so forth. I would provide a penalty provision for anyone who violates that section. I believe a penalty provision should be included. If we are to have a hot cargo clause, we should have some means of enforcing it.

Mr. GORE. The definition which the Senator from Arkansas has offered might be an entirely appropriate one under a broader amendment. The amendment which I have offered relates only to a contract between a labor organization and a common carrier.

I believe the amendment I am offering has particular merit in that a common carrier can become a common carrier only by franchise of the Government. As I understand, that in itself is a right granted by the Government. I do not believe it is fair or proper for a public body to permit such a beneficiary to use the franchise to discriminate against other employers or other labor organizations.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I invite the attention of the Senator to a provision which I have in my amendment:

In any contract or agreement between an employer and any labor organization engaged in activities affecting commerce, any provision whereby such employer undertakes to cease or to refrain from using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in any of the products of any producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person, shall be unlawful.

The Senator limits his amendment to transportation, whereas my amendment would include a secondary boycott contract with someone not using someone else's product.

Mr. GORE. That is a much broader question and may require treatment. I deal with it specifically and limit it to a common carrier. The proposal the Senator has offered would include any interstate commerce. I am not prepared to go quite that far. The specific form I have offered relates to the operations of the Teamsters Union.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It might relate not only to the Teamsters Union but to anyone engaged in interstate commerce. It is not discriminatory.

Mr. GORE. Yes; it could involve airlines, bus lines, and railroads.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to inquire whether it relates solely to the handling of a product, or whether it includes the use of a product.

Mr. GORE. I shall read the language of the amendment:

Enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling or transporting any of the products of any other employer.

Mr. AIKEN. But not "using." Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. It depends on the definition of handling. I believe that some uses would not be encompassed in the definition of handling.

Mr. AIKEN. Are not secondary boycotts related to use rather than transportation? I do not know. I am asking for information.

Mr. GORE. I believe that handling and transporting would cover much of the subject.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I believe the amendment should be tightened by using the words "or to cease doing business with." Those involved could say, "We made a contract to cease doing business with them."

Mr. GORE. I will accept the amendment so far as it relates to a common carrier.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is what my proposed language relates to. If that is all the Senator's amendment relates to, my amendment relates to it also.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I modify my amendment to read as follows:

Enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling, using, or transporting any of the products of any other employer.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I believe the Senator should add to that: "or to cease doing business with any other person." Then the Senator would completely cover the problem. Those involved could agree not to do busines with another person. That would stop the transportation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I accept the modification.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I understand that the amendment, in addition to what the Senator from Tennessee has read, includes the phrase "or to cease doing business with any person."

Mr. GORE. I did not accept "any person." I should like to read the amendment as I understand it to be now: "Any other employer." It is not "any person."

Mr. McCLELLAN. "Person" is defined in the bill. An employer is a person as defined in the bill.

Mr. GORE. I will read the language:

To enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling, using or transporting any of the products of any other employer, or to cease or refrain from doing business with same.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is it. I believe the Senator should use "person."

Mr. KENNEDY. I believe the Senator should use the word "employer." The word "person" is defined as "one or more individuals, labor organizations, partnerships, associations," and so forth. The term "employer" means one person.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am satisfied with the use of "employer."

Mr. GORE. I accept the language.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand it, this wording does not interfere with the right of an employer who is not a common carrier within the meaning of part II of the Interstate Commerce Act to cease doing business or to agree not to carry on business with any other employer if he so desires.

We are attempting to deal with the pressure put on those employers who are covered by the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. GORE. And agreements covered thereby.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like the legislative history to be clear. Will the Senator state his understanding? I do not believe there is any question about what we are attempting to get at. Perhaps the Senator could read his amendment again. In that way we would get the best legislative history that we could have.

Mr. GORE. The purpose of the amendment is to declare and make it "an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer who is a common carrier subject to part II of the Interstate Commerce Act to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains, or agrees to cease or refrain, from handling, using, or transporting any of the products of any other employer, or to cease doing, or refrain from doing, business with same."

Mr. KENNEDY. Tomorrow, after thinking about it over night, we might decide whether we should consider giving priority to the handling of unfair practices arriving under this provision. We should consider whether we ought to give priority to any unfair labor practice charges which might come to the attention of the Board in this particular category.

But I do not think there is any question—and I make this as a parliamentary inquiry—as I understand it, we would not be precluded from a parliamentary point of view from adding a sentence which would state that an unfair labor practice under this section would be subject to injunction and immediate action by the Board, if we should decide tomorrow to do so.

Mr. GORE. The inquiry propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts is whether it would be parliamentarily possible tomorrow to add another section or sentence to the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to study the question further with the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Arkansas, to see if they think that an unfair labor practice under this provision should be given priority, so as to prevent a 2- or 3-year delay in processing the unfair labor practice.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Why not provide a criminal penalty?

Mr. KENNEDY. Why do we not wait and discuss it further tomorrow?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I suggest that the amendment be adopted tonight as is, with a unanimous consent agreement that we shall have all day tomorrow in which to move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, in the event we wish to amend it.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I shall object to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In the first place, it is not necessary to do that.

Mr. GORE. No; it is not necessary. Any amendment which is germane may be offered tomorrow.

Mr. KENNEDY. It would not be in the third degree.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GORE. I yield back the rest of my time.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both sides have yielded back the remainder of their time.

Mr. CAPEHART. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Has the amendment been agreed to? As I understand, the same amendment may be offered tomorrow, if it is deemed advisable to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A further amendment may be offered tomorrow.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, has the question been put?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "4–17–59–CC" and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 54, between lines 13 and 14, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. . Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to require an attorney who is a member in good standing of the bar of any State to include in any report required to be filed pursuant to the provisions of this Act any information which was lawfully communicated to such attorney by any of his clients in the course of a legitimate attorney-client relationship.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes. The amendment specifically exempts from the reporting requirements of the bill any communication between an attorney and his client. I do not know how I can explain the amendment any more completely than that. I think every attorney and every Member of this body understands the historic relationship and sanctity of such communications. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will accept the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to accept the amendment. As I understand, it is the amendment which takes care of the lawyers.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. It goes against my grain to accept the amendment, because no bar association in the United States, as of tonight, has moved against one lawyer who has come before the McClellan committee and who has participated, in one way or another, in the improper practices which have been found. Yet the bar associations, which are supposed to have the highest ethical standards in the world, have not, as of tonight, moved against one attorney who has been involved in these cases.

I know the Senator from Arizona is not an attorney; therefore, he is not a member of a bar association. I am certain he is motivated by a desire to advance the public interest.

I will accept the amendment; and I hope it will encourage the bar associations of the United States to fulfill their responsibility in a more substantial way than they have so far on this particular problem of ethical practices. I think this responsibility is tied in completely with the problem of corrupt practices, "sweetheart" deals, and all the rest of the racketeering and corruption which the committee found to exist in labor-management relations.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am not any happier than is the Senator from Massachusetts about the activities of some of the attorneys who appeared before the committee. But as a layman I recognize that there must be lawyers to represent those people, whether we like the people or not.

As a layman, I believe there should be a perpetuation of the sanctity of relations between attorney and client. I know that if I were involved in a situation in which an attorney was representing me, and a report had to be made, I would not want all of the intimate details of communications between the attorney and me to become public property.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that there have been cases in which the bar associations could have moved against certain lawyers. I hope our little exchange tonight may provide the necessary motivation for that movement.

Mr. KENNEDY. I was not referring to the lawyers who represent criminals, however obnoxious they may be. I was referring to lawyers who deal collusively with crooked unions, crooked union leaders, or crooked employers, and then, in an attempt to protect themselves, justify their actions on the basis of a confidential relationship.

However, the amendment which the Senator is offering is a part of most other laws in related fields; therefore, I will accept the amendment. But I hope—and I believe the Senator from Arizona feels the same way—that bar associations will move with some vigor against lawyers who have, I think, failed to meet the standards of their profession.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. There are similar provisions in the present act which, if enforced, would reach some of the activities of the lawyers to whom the Senator has objected.

We are approaching the end of the 4th day of work on the bill. I think we have made rather remarkable progress. This has been due in large part to the very broadminded, cheerful way in which the Senator from Massachusetts has approached the problem. I think he recognizes, as all of us do, that there is still the possibility of creating out of this measure a workable law which can apply to the problem.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Unless I have been laboring under a delusion for the last 20 years as a member of the bar, it is my understanding that the safeguard of the lawyer-client relationship was designed not to safeguard or protect the lawyer, but the client. I am not so certain that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has been under a misapprehension about it.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator from Illinois had sat on the McClellan committee, he would understand that the practice works both ways.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But that was not the reason it was designed in the first instance, when it was written into the law. The idea was that when a client came into a lawyer's office and laid out his confessional story, a confidential relationship was created, and the lawyer could not be brought into court to testify to the conversations between his client and himself. The law was not designed to defend the lawyer; it was designed to safeguard the American citizen who hired the lawyer.

Mr. KENNEDY. There is no doubt in my mind that the bill which was originally drafted by lawyers adequately protected them. Therefore, I do not feel that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona is wholly necessary. But in order that there may be no question about it, I will accept the amendment.

I am certain that the Senator from Illinois, who is a member of the bar and has been a distinguished Member of the Senate for a long time, must be as concerned as I am that no bar association in any State of the United States has as yet proceeded to take action against any lawyer who appeared before the McClellan committee, not because of the intimate, confidential relationship between lawyer and client, but because the lawyers themselves were engaged in collusive activities with either labor or management. Not one of those lawyers has been subjected to any kind of scrutiny by any bar association in the country.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That may very well be; but I think it is important to anchor the fundamental reason or purpose for protecting this relationship. It has existed since time immemorial. It was designed to protect the client against harassment in case somebody tried to compel him, by process or otherwise, to disclose conversations, confessions, and statements which might have been interchanged between lawyer and client.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am delighted to accept the amendment—I mean to say I accept the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts may not be delighted to accept the amendment; but the Senator from Arizona is delighted to have the amendment accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield back the remainder of the time under his control?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield back the remainder of the time under his control?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, some other amendments are at the desk. Some of them are highly controversial, and will require yea-and-nay votes.

In view of the fact that the Senate has been in session for so long a time today, I do not believe it advisable to ask that the remaining amendments be considered at this time.

Therefore, unless some Senators have amendments which they consider noncontroversial, and which the chairman of the committee is willing to have considered and voted on without having yea-and-nay votes taken on them, I shall move that the Senate stand in adjournment.

Mr. President, if no Senator desires to address the Senate at this time, I shall move that the Senate adjourn until tomorrow, at 10 o'clock a.m.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, before the motion to adjourn is put, may we have some idea as to whether a Saturday session is likely, if the Senate does not complete action on the bill tomorrow?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not the slightest idea. Both the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Arkansas have amendments at the desk. From what they have told me, I am inclined to believe that the Senate may be able to dispose of those amendments tomorrow. If we are able to dispose of them then, by having an evening session, if necessary, we shall do so; and if we are able to take final action on the bill tomorrow evening, we shall not have a Saturday session.

If we are not able to conclude our action on the bill by tomorrow evening, we shall have a Saturday session, and shall continue the session into the evening on Saturday, if necessary.

ADDRESS OF VICE PRESIDENT RICHARD NIXON BEFORE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF NEWSPAPER EDITORS

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, last Saturday Vice President RICHARD NIXON spoke to and then answered questions of the members of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. His comments were forceful and persuasive and, in my judgment, presented sound and excellent American philosophy on foreign policy which merit the conscientious study of my colleagues and of the American people.

I ask unanimous consent to have the address of the Vice President, together with the questions asked and answers given be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the address and questions and answers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF HON. RICHARD M. NIXON, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (AND QUESTION-AND-ANSWER PERIOD FOLLOWING), BEFORE THE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF NEWSPAPER EDITORS, PRESIDENTIAL ROOM, STATLER HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D.C., SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1959

The VICE PRESIDENT. President Healy, my fellow vice presidents, distinguished guests of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, it is a very great honor for me to have the opportunity to appear at this meeting tonight. There are a number of thoughts which have been running through my mind as I have been sitting here surrounded, as I have been, by the president and the newly elected first vice president of this organization.

I have often read, as you have, Mr. Truman's comments to the effect that the Republican press is always giving the Democrats a bad time. Well, I can tell you, as far as this meeting is concerned, it has been just the other way around.

For example, the prize of the evening, the Clapper Award, goes to a man that all of us respect as one of Washington's finest reporters, but it goes to him for writing a story that wasn't too complimentary to Republicans.

Second, I sit between two men, who are not Republican editors; they are Democrats and proud of it.

As a matter of fact, Turner Catledge said he never saw a Republican until he was 23 years of age. [Laughter.]

He said his father took him into town to see him, telling him he was a rather strange fellow—and "he was a strange fellow, too," so Mr. Catledge tells me.

But I must say that I have been very touched by the generous introduction by your president, who is a gentleman in the great tradition, not only of the South, but of New Orleans, one of the beautiful cities of the South.

I noted his comments about the Bloody Mary breakfast this morning, and if I may be permitted to say here what I thought there, I think it is a horrible custom to have a breakfast at 8 o'clock in the morning with Bloody Marys.

Be that as it may, it was an enjoyable affair, and I also noted his comments about the fact that the polls came out favorably as far as I was concerned with regard to 1960.

I particularly appreciated what he had to say about the success of the trips my wife and I have taken abroad—to South America, and more recently to England, and I suppose that some of you might have related the success of those trips to which he referred, to the result of the poll.

I would like to think perhaps that they might have had some beneficial effect. But I am reminded of the fact that while I have had, due primarily to Mrs. Nixon being with me, considerable popularity in England and in some other parts of the world on our trips, a very distinguished man who was mentioned by Mr. Folliard, Adlai Stevenson, has also been very popular when he has gone abroad. I would imagine it is quite possible that both of us would get more votes abroad than we would here in the United States.

In any event, the meeting tonight will primarily be one in which we will have your questions, and in which you will determine what the leads will be by the preciseness and the provocative nature of the questions which you will have the opportunity to ask.

As far as the format is concerned, I have worked it out with your president. He has in hand some written questions which some of you were farsighted enough to submit in advance. But I recognize that when written questions are used, there is not the opportunity for the followup kind of questions which result in the cross-examination which sharpens an issue.

So, as I understand it, Mr. Healy will read a written question, he will then give the audience an opportunity to ask a question. Since there are no microphones in the audience, due to the fact that we didn't have time to remove the tables, I will try to repeat the question.

Incidentally, Mr. Healy paid me a very high compliment tonight: When we came in I said, "There's a very big crowd," and he said, "You ought to be complimented, it's almost as big as the one we had yesterday for Dr. Castro." [Laughter.]

Now, before we begin, if I could just say a word about two events of today—two news events that I know will be covered by questions, and which I think you might like to have a comment upon at this point.

I mentioned Dr. Castro's visit, and I am looking forward to the opportunity of seeing him tomorrow at my office in the Capitol after he has appeared on "Meet the Press."

I also think that it might be appropriate at this time to refer to some of the comments that he made on Cuban-American relations, and in referring to those comments I would say, first of all, that I am sure that his visit will serve one very useful purpose: No one can come to the United States, no one can talk to American audiences, no one can talk to the officials of our Government, as Dr. Castro will and has, without going back convinced that the U.S. Government and people share wholeheartedly the aspirations of the people of Latin America for peace with justice, for democratic freedom, for economic progress, and for the strengthening of the institutions of representative government. [Applause.]

It was almost a year ago that I returned from Latin America. And, during the year since I returned, we have been making steady progress toward these goals. We have seen some new avenues of economic cooperation opened through the discussions of the organization, American States Committee of Twenty-One, and here I think we should give due recognition to the initiative of President Kubitschek for suggesting this Operation Pan America.

In addition, as you have noted in your papers, and if you listen to television, you heard on television that the 21 American Republics have now signed the final act of the Inter-American Development Bank which, when placed in operation, will provide another source of capital for Latin American development needs. And which, very appropriately and importantly takes Latin America out of the category of the other areas of the world, the so-called underdeveloped nations, and properly gives it a special consideration which is what Latin America should have in view of the special problems which are theirs and ours because of the proximity and the other ties that we have with the Latin American nations.

These steps, along with measures that have been taken by many of the Latin American governments in cooperation with the international monetary funds to stabilize their internal financial situations, are a positive move designed to strengthen economies of the Western Hemisphere. I would not suggest that we could underestimate the seriousness of the economic problem still faced by Latin America, but there have been major solutions to those problems proposed, and we are making definite progress in those solutions at this time.

One other comment with regard to Dr. Castro that I think is worth making. He referred to the problem of intervention, and I would say on that score that the recent flareups of tension in the Caribbean area, with reports of activities in various countries designed to overthrow the governments of other nations, emphasizes the importance of this principle of nonintervention to which we are all dedicated in the Americas.

The Organization of American States has played an outstanding role in maintaining the peace and security of the area. Each country in the Americas must be assured of the right to develop its political life, free from outside intervention. That is why the United States announced at Montevideo, 26 years ago, its willingness to adhere to the principle of nonintervention. That is why, in the following year the Platt amendment to which Dr. Castro referred yesterday was abrogated by agreement with the government leaders of Cuba.

I am confident that nothing has contributed more to the growth of freedom and democracy in this region than the steadfast devotion of the American public to the principle of nonintervention, and the United States will certainly continue to practice and preach that principle in its relations with our friends in the Americas.

And, one final comment on another piece of news which developed today:

You noted the selection by the President of a new Secretary of State, a selection which will affect the whole course of American foreign policy in years ahead.

I would like to say a word about the man who was selected, because I know him, and know him well, having served with him in the Congress and having served under him when I was a member of the Herter committee which studied the Marshall plan in Europe in 1947. On the basis of my knowledge of him, there are these comments I would like to make to this audience tonight.

He is a man, in my opinion, who by background, experience, and temperament is eminently qualified to carry forward Secretary Dulles' policies and principles. And, those who have had the opportunity to know him, as I have, known him not only as one of America's foremost students of foreign affairs, but also as a tenacious and persuasive advocate of his views at the conference table. This means that the American people can be confident that the interests of this country will be vigorously and ably represented in any conference in which he participates.

Thank you.

Mr. HEALY. Thank you very much, Mr. Vice President.

The first question comes from Bradley Black, of the Cincinnati Enquirer: "What value to the United States do you expect to be derived from your trip to Russia?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. I think, as the President indicated in his statement when he announced that I was going to the Soviet Union, one of the major values of this kind of a trip is the opportunity it provides for better understanding between government officials and between the peoples of the countries involved.

In this connection, for example, I shall have the opportunity to open the American exposition. I shall also have the opportunity, I trust, to meet people in all walks of life in the Soviet Union, as my wife and I have in 50 countries which we have visited up to this time.

There will probably be an opportunity as well to meet various officials of the Soviet Union.

I should emphasize that the purpose of this trip is not to negotiate settlements of differences between our two countries, but there will be certainly an opportunity to have a frank discussion of those differences and, wherever there is discussion, whenever there is the chance to meet face-to-face and lay the differences on the table, I believe that the interests of better understanding are served and that the possibilities of actions being taken by one country or another because of miscalculation as to the intentions of that country, are considerably reduced.

These are the values that I would primarily see as the result of this trip.

Mr. HEALY. Mr. Vice President, we have two related questions which I believe I should ask before we ask for a related question from the audience: "Do you think there are areas of give-and-take between us and the Soviet Union in the interests of world peace?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are certainly areas of give-and-take wherever there are differences between nations at the conference table. But I should distinguish the area of being flexible with regard to tactics and flexibility with regard to principle.

I know that Mr. Dulles, for example, has often been criticized because it is claimed that he has been inflexible, yet he has been one of the best negotiators at the conference table that this nation has ever had, as Secretary of State, and I would emphasize that as far as his inflexibility is concerned, that it was a position that he took in firm adherence to and advocacy of the principles of freedom and justice which not only we in the United States believe in, but in which people throughout the free world also believe. And, when you are inflexible with regard to advocacy of principles and standing on principles, I submit that this kind of inflexibility is what the United States should continue to want from its foreign policy leaders. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. Here is a double question: Donald Breed, of the Freeport, Ill., Journal Standard writes, anticipating with full approval your visit to Moscow, I still wish to ask this naive question. "What is to be our technique of dealing with an adversary whose code of morals frankly rejects the obligation to live up to engagements entered into and whose record is full of broken pledges?"

Can you suggest some obligation which Russia will find self-interest in assuming and respecting?

Vice President NIXON. This, of course, is a very broad question and it would require analysis of each segment of the world and each conflict or each point of difference between the Soviet Union and the United States.

I would say that the question itself suggests the answer and the answer is that you must find that type of agreement in which the Soviet Union will find that self-interest requires that it live up to the obligation.

Now, this means that we have a long, hard road ahead of us because there is a record of broken treaties as we know and there are areas where we find that Soviet self-interest is such that the only kind of agreement that could be reached would be one which would weaken the position of the free world and strengthen the position of the Soviet world. But, this does not mean that we should not continue to try, because there is no alternative to trying to negotiate which is acceptable either to us or, we would also hope, to them.

That is one of the reasons, for example, that I suggested on Monday of this week an approach which I think is worth exploring. This would not be an approach in which we would, as some have suggested, submit all the differences between nations to an international court of justice for decision, because, being perfectly realistic, as someone has said, where nations are concerned you can arbitrate rights, but not interest.

On the other hand, there must be some areas where even now we could have a rule of law in place of a rule of force.

And so, if we are to move along this line, we could suggest that while a court could not decide what the agreement between parties should be—we would not want that, neither would the Soviet Union—once the parties do make an agreement, we realize that one of the major causes for disagreement after that is over the interpretation of the agreement, what the agreement means. That is why I have suggested that once the parties do agree, they might well write into the international agreement a provision to the effect that if there is any difference about interpretation, that difference would be decided by the International Court of Justice and that the parties would agree to be bound by the decision of the Court.

Now, some have suggested that the Soviet Union will not accept such a provision, and others have contended that the United States should not move this far in that direction because of the risks involved as far as our interests are concerned.

But, I say tonight that though we must always be careful in any international agreements we make to see that the interests of the United States are protected, we have to realize that we must find acceptable alternatives to the use and the paramount position of force as the means of settling international disputes.

I do not suggest that this proposal I have made is a complete answer. There is no complete answer. There is no easy answer. We are going to have, as the President suggested, tension and disagreement for years and years ahead, but we must plow forward. We must continue on our part—believing as we do in the rule of law in our own internal relations—to make positive suggestions in this line and take the leadership. Only in that way will we have the opportunity, perhaps, to get the Soviet Union at some time to go along with us, even part of the way, and only in that way, and this is also important, will we keep before the world the picture of the United States and the free world standing for, and practicing, the principles of freedom and justness under law, rather than totalitarianism and force. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. Thank you very much, sir.

Are there any questions from the floor related to the Vice President's trip to Russia?

Mr. MAHAFFEY. Mr. Healy, I am James Mahaffey of the Texarkana Gazette. I would like to ask the Vice President exactly what he thinks Mr. Khrushchev meant when he said, "We will bury you."

Mr. HEALY. Mr. J. Q. Mahaffey, of Texarkana, asks what Mr. Khrushchev meant when he said, "We will bury you."

Vice President NIXON. If I have the opportunity to see Mr. Khrushchev when I go to Moscow, I intend to ask him that as one question.

On second thought, though, I can put him on the stand as a witness right here tonight: Mr. Khrushchev said—after his statement received large circulation throughout the United States and the free world—that he did not mean that he intended to bury us by dropping atomic bombs on our world and risking them being dropped on his, but that he intended to bury us by winning the economic struggle for the world.

I think I can put it in another way by relating to you the attitude Mr. Mikoyan had when he was here.

I asked him how he thought communism would come to the United States. I asked him the question first before he started around the United States, and I asked it again after he had visited Detroit, Los Angeles, and other great production centers of this country—after he had had an opportunity to see the conditions of our workers and the high living standards that we have.

In presenting the question to him, I said: "In view of the standard of living of America's workers, in view of what our labor leaders told you when you were here, do you believe that communism will come to the United States in the usual Marxist pattern of the workers rising against the bourgeoisie, or the employers, and establishing a government by the proletariat?"

And, his answer was very interesting bearing on this point. He said, "No; I will have to admit that the condition of your workers in the United States is such that we cannot rely on that method of bringing about communism, but of this I am sure: Communism will eventually come to this country, and it will come in this way. It will come when the people of the United States will look at the Soviet Union and will see that our system is more productive, more efficient, and does more for people than yours. Then the people of the United States will at that time turn to communism in order to avoid becoming a second-class power, economically."

Mr. Khrushchev, of course, would support Mr. Mikoyan in that view, and I would say the lesson for us is this: not that they said it, but that they believe it.

Whatever we may think of communism, and we have our attitudes toward it, very well justified ones, in my opinion, but whatever we may think of it we must recognize that in Mr. Mikoyan, Mr. Khrushchev, and other leaders of the Communist world, we have men who are fanatically dedicated, dedicated in two senses:

One, that their system is superior; and two, believing that eventually it will prevail.

And, what is why in this country, recognizing that we are confronted with men who, whatever we may think of them, have faith in their system; we need a similar faith, a faith in the fact that this system in our country and in other parts of the free world, with all its faults, has still produced the greatest prosperity, the greatest freedom that men have ever known.

We must have faith that this is the wave of the future. And I might say, in concluding my answer to this question, that in the great struggle going on in the world today, we must recognize that whether it is in South America, the Near East, Asia, or Africa, there are millions of people who above everything else want a better way of life. They would prefer to have that better way of life and keep their freedom, but if they cannot get it with freedom, then without freedom. You can be sure that inevitably if there is no alternative they will accept a system which promises a better way of life, even if it denies freedom.

This, therefore, is the challenge to us. You cannot expect to meet and defeat a great force which is on the move, which is confident, which is aggressive—you cannot expect to meet and defeat it with a force which is static, which is interested only in holding its own. That is why I have suggested in the past and I suggest again here tonight that we in the United States must not only see that our system works here but we must recognize that ours is the true revolution and we must convey that message more effectively than we have in the past to the peoples all over the world who want a better way of life. We must indicate to them by our example and by our interest in them, that they can have real progress economically but have it in a climate of freedom without having to turn to dictatorship to get it. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. We are ready to come closer to home now.

I have got to explain that this question was written before that very important meeting over at the National Press Club this morning.

The question comes from Felicia Patterson, of Newsday: "If at the 1960 Republican convention a situation were to arise where it would be in the best interest of party harmony for you to accept the Vice Presidential nomination again, would you be willing to seek an unprecedented third term as Vice President?" [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. I really ought not to give an off-the-cuff answer to that question, but I will.

I would only suggest that, as one who voted for the two-term amendment limiting the holding of the Presidency to two terms, I think it would be inconsistent for me to seek the Vice Presidency for a third term. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. There is one along the same line from Bill Ulston, of the Minneapolis Star and Tribune: "Would you accept Nelson Rockefeller as a running mate in 1960?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, I think that question should be better put to him rather than to me.

Seriously speaking, of course, I recognize that there is a considerable interest in who will be the candidates on both the Republican and Democratic tickets in 1960.

I anticipated, as a matter of fact, the question tonight as to whether I might be a candidate in 1960. I intended to answer that question by saying that this was not the time to make such an announcement or such a decision, and since I, of course, have not made a decision myself as to 1960, that I am prepared to announce, it would not be appropriate for me to talk about who the running mate should be at this time.

May I just add this one point though with regard to Mr. Rockefeller: I think that the Republican Party is fortunate to have as a Governor of a major State, a man who has proved that he could get elected when many other Republicans were losing, and a man who, as Governor of the State, inherited some very difficult problems and has dealt with them courageously and ably. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. Here is a tripleheader from Bill McMorrow of Gainesville, Ga., John O'Hallis from the Bismarck, N. Dak., Tribune, and Louis L. Harris, of the Augusta, Ga., Chronicle: "Do you feel that the administration is relaxing its demand for immediate, total integration and if such a trend exists, do you approve?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, as I understand it, uses the words "immediate, total integration."

First of all, I should point out that the adminstration's position has not been, is not now, and should not be immediate total integration.

We have to deal with the facts of life as they are. As far as the administration's position is concerned, I believe that it is a sound position. It is one which avoids both extremes, the extreme on the one hand which says, "We shall do nothing," which means there will be no progress; and the extreme on the other hand which indicates we will do too much, and which might result in losing ground rather than gaining it.

What we have tried to do is to take what is a firm position in behalf of progress in this field, recognizing that you can't change in 1 year, 2 years, even 5 years, customs, practices, that have developed over a period of almost 100 years. And I think that as long as we go ahead on this line, this offers the best hope for eventual solution of what, to all Americans, is a very difficult and complicated problem.

I would just like to add one personal note with regard to the solution of this problem in which those in this room can play a part. I remember one of my professors in law school, a professor in contracts, made a statement to this effect, the very first day of school:

"Gentlemen, there is only one rule or one principle you should remember, if you forget everything else you heard in this course. A contract is only as good as the will of the parties to keep it."

We could, I think, draw an analogy there and say that a law is only as good as the will of the people to obey it. But, this does not mean that you do not pass a law until all of the people are ready to obey it.

It does mean, however, that in enacting legislation in a field like this, you must recognize that it is the responsibility of public opinion leaders throughout the country to develop within the society the support for the law, which is essential if the law is to be effective; and that support must come from the hearts of the people. And it must come from the hearts of the people not only because they believe that to obey the law is right, but eventually it must come because they also believe that the law is right.

I would not suggest this is easy, as I have already indicated, and having as I do a little southern background through attending school at Duke University for 3 years. But I do know, as I consider this problem, that from an economic standpoint the United States cannot afford to fail to deal effectively with problems which result in 17 million citizens in this country not having the opportunity to develop the skills and to make the ultimate maximum contribution that they can and should to our economic development.

I do know, too, that from a moral standpoint we recognize that there is a great cause involved in this problem, and finally from an international standpoint, I would add this last point:

My wife and I have traveled, as I have indicated, through many countries abroad. Mr. Khrushchev refers to "burying us." The war that he refers to, or claims to refer to, has already begun and it is going on in Asia, in Africa, and the Near East. A billion people live there. They hold the balance of power in the world.

The question is: Which way will they go?

Economic policies will have a great deal to determine which way they go. Our diplomatic policies will have a great deal of impact on this question, but I can assure you, that as much as anything else will be this major factor:

The people who live in these countries are different in many ways, different religions, different clothing, different housing, customs and food. But they are alike in one way—they are not white.

And, having traveled abroad and having spoken to these people in terms of the traditional beliefs of the United States of equality of opportunity, of recognizing the individual dignity of a man, regardless of his background, I can only say that it is most difficult for a representative of this country to talk one way abroad, and then to explain our practices at home.

Now, finally, I would add one other thought: I think there has been too much of a tendency to indicate that this whole problem of prejudice, call it what you will, depending on the point of view, is simply a southern problem. It is a northern problem as well. It exists in our great cities in the North. It exists in the South. And there are honest differences of opinion about it. But, I am convinced of this: Considering the interests of the United States alone, clearly apart from the interests of our Negro citizens, the best interests of the United States will be served by continuing with a program which produces steady progress in this field.

And those of you who are the opinion makers can play a great part in helping this progress to become a reality. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. Is there a question from the floor on this subject?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a question from the head table on that, I was going to ask.

Mr. HEALY. No, sir.

Mr. Vice President, "will you give us your evaluation, sir, of the importance of the so-called missile gap in the United States over the next several years as a factor in the present Soviet bullying attitude? Has it weakened the American negotiating position?"

That is from Bob Easterbrook, of the Washington Post.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I would say that, as far as the missile gap is concerned, if the Soviet leaders actually believe there is a gap—a military gap as distinguished from missile gap—this definitely would weaken our position vis-a-vis the Soviet Union at the bargaining table.

I would say, second, however, that looking at the situation at present, there is no question in the minds of our military leaders—as Senator JOHNSON himself pointed out after recent hearings he had in this field—there is no question but that the United States and the free world today have military strength which is great enough to meet and defeat any aggressor, if aggression is launched against the free world.

We believe we have the strength. I think the Soviet leaders probably believe we have it also. And as long as we have this strength this means that when our negotiators go to the Foreign Ministers Conference and when the President goes to a summit conference—if the Foreign Ministers Conference develops along such lines that a summit conference will be held—both the President and the Secretary of State and the other leaders of the free world can deal from a position of strength.

They will not have to submit to missile blackmail on the part of the Soviet Union.

Now, looking to the immediate future, what the missile gap refers to, of course, is the claim that 3 years from now, 4 years from now, if the intelligence estimates we have on the Soviet Union are accurate, they may have more intercontinental ballistic missiles than we have. Our answer to that is that 3 or 4 years from now while there may arise a situation where they may have more intercontinental ballistic missiles, as for example they now have more submarines than we have, the time will never arrive when our overall strength will not be sufficient that they could not risk an attack on us without bringing upon them damage that they would not voluntarily want to bring upon themselves.

And, I would say also in answer to this question then that if the determination of the American people, as reflected in the Congress of the United States and the administration continues, and if our allies continue to take the strong stand that they do with us on this matter, that I do not see a time coming in the foreseeable future in which the United States will be in a military position, along with our allies, which is such that the Soviet Union will be able to blackmail us.

And I would say finally that the responsible leaders of this country, whether they are Democrat or Republican, I am sure will never allow that situation to come about. We shall do what is necessary to maintain the strength to deter aggression. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. Are there any questions from the floor on this issue?

Mr. Joseph B. Farrell, of the Macon, Ga., News asks if the United States believed there was a serious threat of communism in Cuba, would we do anything about it, and if so, what?

The VICE PRESIDENT. I would say first of all with regard to the threat of communism in Cuba, and throughout the American Hemisphere, that we are all aware that all of the countries in the hemisphere have an interest in seeing that that threat does not become so great that the Communists are able to dominate any government in the hemisphere. And I should point out, too, that this is traditional in the American Republics, traditional since the time of the Monroe Doctrine. Because for communism to come to any one of the American Republics is the very foreign intervention to which the Monroe Doctrine referred. This is the reason why we, in our discussions with the leaders of other countries and with the peoples of other countries in this hemisphere, can honestly say that we are speaking in their interest when we urge that they join with us in resisting any Communist infiltration which might result in control of a government.

Now, referring to Cuba, I visited Cuba 3 years ago. I, of course, did not have the opportunity on a visit as brief as those we must take, to see as many people in all walks of life as I might have liked, but I saw a great number.

I would say first of all that the great majority of the Cuban people, based not only on my visit but also on my study of Cuba and its problems, are not susceptible to the kind of appeal which the Communists might make.

Or, putting it another way, they might be susceptible to what the Communists might say in attempting to get power, but the Cuban people, the great majority of them certainly do not want a Communist government in Cuba.

And, I would say that, looking to the future, that I do not anticipate that the hypothesis suggested in this question would come about, and the reason I do not anticipate it is that the Cuban people themselves will not tolerate a Communist government or a Communist takeover. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. Thank you.

Do I see anyone that wants to ask anything further on that?

Mr. H. P. Pickrell, of the Albuquerque Journal: "Assuming there is a summit conference this year, do you expect to attend it along with President Eisenhower?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. I have noticed conjecture in the papers with regard to the possible attendance of the Vice President at a summit conference, and I can only say that there has been no decision with regard to any attendance by the Vice President at a summit conference.

Mr. HEALY. Here we get back to another tough one: "How far should we go in regulating big business? How far should we go in regulating labor which has become big business?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. I could, of course, spend a great deal of time in answering that question, and I will spend a little because it is a broad question and I think since it is the first question on economics we have had tonight, you might be interested in my thinking on it.

Business is big in the United States, and labor is big, and Government is big. And it seems to me that one of the primary functions of those of us in positions of responsibility is to find ways and means to see that these great power complexes—whether they are business, labor, or government—do not work against the interests of the individual—that they do not have the effect of cutting off and discouraging the inventiveness, the individuality which has been the reason for America's greatness and its progress in the past.

We now come to how you do it.

We have, of course as you know, antitrust laws to deal with the power complexes in business. To a certain extent they can be effective and in other areas they are not.

As far as labor is concerned, the Congress is presently debating that question. A bill is before the Senate, the Kennedy-Ervin bill. The bill has been amended in committee considerably, and substantially improved. In my opinion, however, it is a bill which should be further amended by the Senate itself, amended particularly in this respect: The bill as it presently is written deals almost exclusively with the internal operation of unions—providing for union members certain principles of union democracy and providing control over the expenditures of their funds.

What is needed is legislation amending the Taft-Hartley Act, legislation amending it which will close two major loopholes, dealing not with the internal relationships and organizations of unions, but dealing with the relationship of unions with business and the general public.

And I refer to provisions which should outlaw so-called blackmail and organizational picketing and which would strengthen the secondary boycott and/or hot cargo provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. [Applause.]

It seems to me that it is vitally important for us to recognize that the function of government is to see that a proper balance is maintained between the power of business, on the one hand, and the power of labor, on the other. And the enactment of the administration bill, I think is the least that should be done in this session of Congress in dealing with this particular problem.

Now, I could go one step further.

There has been a great deal of discussion about what the Government ought to do when these power complexes get so big that the decisions they make may affect adversely the public interest.

We hear, for example, a great deal of discussion there days with regard to the wage price negotiations that are taking place in the steel industry. You have noted the President's comments with regard to the fact that the public has a stake in how these negotiations come out, as well as the parties at the contract table.

I would only say with regard to these negotiations that certainly there is a great public interest because whatever your theory about inflation—whether you believe that the demand pull has been the primary factor in the inflation for the past 25 years, or the cost push which seems to have been the major factor in the last 2 years—whatever your theory, there isn't much question but that when we have had periods of inflation they have generally been accompanied by periods in which wage increases have exceeded productivity and so we come to the key question: What should happen in steel?

What we have said up to this time is that the public interest will suffer if there is a wage increase in steel which is inflationary—inflationary either by forcing up the price of steel or inflationary, assuming the price of steel remains stable, by its effect on other wage scales and thereby forcing up the price levels in other commodities.

Now, we come to the question which I know immediately will be on your minds. If the public does have an interest, if there should not be a wage-price settlement in steel which is inflationary, what is the Government going to do about it?

There have been some very well-intentioned and thoughtful proposals as to what the Government ought to do.

Mr. KEFAUVER is having some hearings in which he is attempting to get at the bottom of this problem.

Others have suggested that before any major industry, like steel, raises its prices, the Congress should have hearings, and others have suggested that we need a system in these great, major industries of price controls, failing to recognize in some instances, that you cannot have price controls without also having wage controls.

I will say this with regard to the administration's position at this time. We think it would be a mistake for the administration to interfere in the steel wage-price negotiations because if we do interfere, we set a precedent, and once you interfere in a wage-price negotiation like this, then in all future times one party or the other, depending upon what they think they can get out of the administration in power, instead of agreeing to settle at the bargaining table, will push the conflict upstairs. This would not be in the public interest.

Bringing this question to a close, may I just say that certainly all of those who are participating in the wage-price negotiations in steel must recognize that if a wage increase which is inflationary does come about, this will give tremendous impetus to the demand that either the Congress or the administration, or both, take stronger steps.

May I also say in that connection the reasons why we in the administration believe that we should avoid Government intervention, avoid Government controls is, one, because we realize that in peacetime it would be very doubtful if they would work; and two, because it would mean that we would be suppressing the American economy at a time that we wanted it to expand.

I think a quote from Tolstoi is very appropriate on this point. It seems to me to point up the weakness of the position of those who say Government should control the economy in order to serve the people.

As I recall it, it goes something like this:

"I sit on a man's back choking him and making him carry me, and yet assure myself and others that I am very sorry for him and wish to ease his lot by all possible means—except by getting off his back."

That is exactly the position the Government is in when it does too much; when you have Government controls trying to help the people where people better could help themselves if the Government would only get off their back. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALY. Mr. Vice President, I think you have been most generous in answering our questions.

Would you care to close with a brief closing statement, sir?

The VICE PRESIDENT. May I say, Mr. Healy, that I do not want you to think that because I was submitted to a great deal of southern influence tonight I intended to filibuster as long as I did on the last question. But I anticipated there might be some other questions on economic issues, and I do appreciate the opportunity that has been presented to comment as I did.

The hour is late. I can assure you, as one who has made appearances in many countries around the world as a representative of the President of the American people, it is a truly great honor to appear before one of the most influential audiences in all of the free world today.

I would just like to add a word with regard to a man whom I called on day before yesterday; a man who has sometimes appeared before this organization; one who has been criticized by some, commended by others, and written about by everyone in this organization—the Secretary of State.

I had approximately an hour's chat with him day before yesterday. I can tell you that his spirit is magnificent, and his analysis and understanding of world problems is just as sharp as it ever was.

It happens, as you know from my public statements, that I am one of Mr. Dulles' supporters and one who admires him. I know too that in this audience, whether you have criticized or agreed with him, everyone respects him as a devoted, dedicated man who has, in a real sense, spent his whole life, lived for this great moment which, because of physical disability, he is unable to consummate at this time.

One little personal note I think might be of interest. I recall seeing the Secretary when he returned from his last trip to Europe. I think history will record that that trip not only was one of the most successful negotiating missions by a Secretary of State in history—because bringing together the American or allied positions as he did by his conversations with Mr. Macmillan, with Mr. Adenauer, and with President de Gaulle was indeed a superb accomplishment—but it will also be recognized that it was a truly heroic performance by a dedicated American.

I can tell you that, having seen him when he immediately returned, I asked him, because I had known he had been ill when he left, how it had been. He said, "Well, I found that during the course of the negotiations each day that I never felt a bit of pain, but at the end of the day," he said, "then it would come down on me like a great wave."

And, during the entire course of that trip, approximately a week, the Secretary of State conducting these terribly important negotiations was not able to keep down a single meal.

And finally one little note, on the human side of a great man. That day it happened that we were having luncheon in the State Department. I had the usual chicken and creamed peas that was on the State Department menu, and Mr. Dulles, as was his custom, had a little scoop of cottage cheese and some fresh fruit, in this case this particular day I happened to note that the fresh fruit that he was having was fresh figs which had been flown in from California.

Just in passing, during the course of his discussing with me the situation, not only in Europe and in Asia as well, I mentioned that my wife, Pat, was very fond of fresh figs but they were rather difficult to get in Washington.

I went back to my office, came home that night, and at 6 o'clock the doorbell rang. Mr. Dulles' chauffeur was at the door, and he brought with him a little box, a box in which originally there were 12 figs. Three had been removed, and a handwritten note to my wife saying that he had heard at noon that she liked fresh figs and he hoped she enjoyed these from California.

I repeat this story, not because it affects what will happen in Berlin, not because it will have any bearing on editorials that may be written with regard to the administration or on other great issues, but I repeat it because I wanted you to share with me the knowledge that this man, who is known primarily for his dogged determination, for his ability to work harder than almost any man in any administration could be expected to work, also has a very sensitive and a very thoughtful human side which those of us who were close to him were privileged to know.

Thank you, and good night. [Applause.]

(Whereupon, at 10:45 o'clock p.m., the press conference was concluded.)

STAFF AND SALARIES

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, several weeks ago I gave to a reporter for the Associated Press a list of the names of employees in the office I hold together with the salaries of each. This information was specifically made available to representatives of other newspapers, also, at the same time. In fact, I have regarded the payroll of a public office as public information throughout my public service.

So far as I can ascertain, the information regarding the payroll in my office has not been published by any newspaper. I do not complain about this as I am confident that more important news has been available for printing. Nevertheless, I desire to have the information to appear in public print as a matter of public interest. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the names of the employees in my office and their salaries appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the names and salaries were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	Gross annual salary
William G. Allen, administrative assistant	$16,300.00
Andrew J. Lynch, assistant clerk	14,162.02
Jack W. Robinson, assistant clerk	10,113.73
Elizabeth F. Peoples, assistant clerk	7,551.53
Thelma W. Abbott, assistant clerk	6,760.25
Phyllis J. Hurwitz, assistant clerk	1,993.69
Garland Draper, assistant clerk	6,534.19
Emma B. Pickett, assistant clerk	6,534.19
Miriam W. Pickett, assistant clerk	6,534.19
Christine Coggins, assistant clerk	4,951.65

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this is perhaps the smallest staff in the U.S. Senate, but it is composed of highly competent people. I am proud of each member of the staff and of the group as a whole. Their loyalty to me and their dedication to public service is a source of satisfaction and gratitude.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE U.S. PATENT OFFICE SYMBOLIZES RECOGNITION OF THE CREATIVE MIND IN OUR PROGRESS AS A NATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, April is the anniversary month of the U.S. Patent Office, during which month we give recognition to the first patent law of the United States, and thereby pay indirect tribute to the inventiveness of the individual and inquiring mind.

On April 10, 1790, President Washington signed the first law of the new Federal Government relating to the issuance of special patents for the invention of "any useful art, manufacture, engine, machine or device, or any improvement thereon not before known or used." Thus, for the first time in history there was legally established the principle of the intrinsic, though limited, right of the inventor to the fruits of his own creation.

Although the idea of the patent had first been proposed by Francis Bacon in 1601—and first granted in England in 1624, and in the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1641—it had remained a royal prerogative, or in the New World, a special prerogative of the colonial legislatures. This practice remained in effect until the adoption of the Federal Constitution which gave the Congress the "power to promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and inventions."

Thus did the new Republic acknowledge the Government's joint responsibility of promoting the public welfare while protecting the benefits of the individual. And in thus fostering the inventive genius of the American people, the Federal Government laid one of the essential elements in the foundation of an industrial system which has been one of the marvels of the modern age. In the words of Thomas Jefferson, who, as the first Secretary of State, was also the first administrator of the Patent Office:

> The issue of patents for new discoveries has given a spring to invention beyond my conception.

It is fitting, Mr. President, that this act—which has been copied in one form or another by most of the free industrial countries of the world—would be borne in that Nation which has most emphasized the worth and dignity of the individual. For creativity—whether in the fine arts, the practical arts, or in pure science—is a product of the free, inquiring, and creative mind of the individual man and woman. This remains so today, Mr. President, even when the inventor has now been brought from the shed and corner garage into the highly organized laboratories of the great universities and industrial corporations.

For the group does not create—only the individual creates. The group has seldom written a poem, composed a symphony, or constructed an idea. The group may analyze—it may criticize—it may develop an idea—but it does not create it. This retains the lonely process of the individual and searching intellect of man.

For 160 years, Mr. President, the process of individual creativity has been protected and fostered under the patent legislation of the Federal Government. This statute remains symbolic of the continuing regard of a democratic society for the fruits of personal effort.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

PRAYER

Rev. Charles W. Holland, Jr., B.D., Th. M., Pastor, Fountain Memorial Baptist Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

God's word stated in I Samuel 16:7: The Lord seeth not as man seeth for man looketh on the outward appearance but the Lord looketh on the heart.

Holy and illimitable God we rejoice that the heart of man instead of the outward appearance is read by Thee.

As we go about our diurnal duties, may we discipline ourselves by remembering that Thou dost perceive what we are thinking. May we control our thinking in such a way that we will be glad when we remember that Thou art observing our thoughts as if they were reflected on a giant screen.

This expression of gratitude and supplication we make to Thee in the name of Jesus. Amen.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1) entitled "An act to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. SMATHERS, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, and Mr. COTTON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. MADDEN, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 248, Rept. No. 289), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5610) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR AND HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE FISCAL YEAR 1960

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight on Tuesday next to file a report on the Departments of Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1960; and that it be in order to consider it in the House on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will divide the proposition, I shall not object. But I must object to taking it up next Thursday, because I do not think there is ample time from Tuesday to Thursday for Members of the House to acquaint themselves with a bill involving as much as that appropriation bill. Moreover, that procedure is not in conformance with the 3-day rule.

In other words, the bill would be reported on Tuesday, and it is proposed to call it up on Thursday. I say that is not enough time in view of the fact that no copies of bill will be available until Tuesday.

Mr. FOGARTY. The hearings have been printed.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LAIRD. The hearings on the Health, Education, and Welfare appropriation bill are all printed. The committee report will be printed Tuesday morning. The bill will be available on Tuesday morning when it is considered in the full committee. That gives 2 days after the bill has been printed for the bill to be considered by every Member of the House. The hearings are now available to any Member who wishes to look over them.

Mr. GROSS. I restate my position: I am not opposed to reporting the bill, but I am opposed to taking it up in that short space of time, on Thursday of next week. Therefore, I object. Let the gentleman come in with a request to report the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the calendar Wednesday rule may be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. HALLECK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object, I wonder if the gentleman from Oklahoma could inform us as to the program for next week.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to respond to the request of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana.

Monday is District Day. There is no legislative business for that day.

On Tuesday the House will consider H.R. 5610, a bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act. That bill is programed for general debate on Tuesday and for consideration under the 5-minute rule on Wednesday.

For Thursday and balance of the week, we will consider the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare appropriation bill for 1960.

Any further program will be announced later. Conference reports, of course, may be brought up at any time.

Mr. HALLECK. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

AUTOMATION

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to create a select committee to conduct a full and complete investigation and study of the effects of automation on employment, employment opportunities, and the composition of the labor force.

For over 15 years scientists have been bringing forth hundreds of new inventions in the field of electronics. The most common term used to describe this new technology of electronic controls and electronic computers is automation.

Some people designate automation as introducing the second industrial revolution. The first industrial revolution substituted steampowered machines for animal and human musclepower; it turned the handtool worker into a machine tender. Automation tends to use electronic devices to replace human regulation and control of machines; it tends to change the machine tender into a supervisor of an automatically controlled operating system.

Unquestionably, automation can bring great improvements to our economy; if handled right, the potential benefits of automation are unlimited. Automation can and should make possible the 4-day workweek, longer vacations for workers, earlier retirement, and an increase in our standard of living. Automation can free workers from routine, repetitious tasks which the machines can be taught to do and give workers who perform those tasks the opportunity to develop higher skills.

Automation is not an unmixed blessing. Automation will increase productivity considerably, but increased manhour output without increased total production and growing consumer markets is a formula for depression. Without customers for the mounting output made possible by rising productivity, unemployment is inevitable. Machines certainly do not buy machines; without workers buying the products of industry, production is useless.

Let us study for a moment the impact of the first industrial revolution on Great Britain. In the wake of this great change, slums, child labor, ill health, ignorance, and human misery were the unfortunate results. There was lacking a responsible social policy for transforming the benefits of new machinery into economic abundance and new leisure for the workers; a few thousand people became very rich, but hundreds of thousands of people became very poor.

Since the time of James Watt our society, as well as our industry, has learned new social techniques for handling these great adjustments. We have learned to adjust to the first industrial revolution, but not to the second. It would be tragic for the Federal Government and industry to wait until conditions approximate those present during the first industrial revolution before attempting remedial measures; by then it might be too late.

I would like to quote from part of the 1955 report of the Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization of the congressional Joint Committee on the Economic Report:

> It is clearly wrong to dismiss automation as nothing more than an extension of mechanization. We are clearly on the threshold of an industrial age, the significance of which we cannot predict and with potentialities which we cannot fully appreciate.
> Whenever one has been in a position to have witnessed firsthand the hardships experienced by the skilled and older worker in any line of endeavor—industrial or professional—suddenly wrenched from the job by the installation of a new machine, or new technology, one can scarcely be unmindful of the inequities which can come about where management and public policy have not given recognition to needs for retraining, relocation, severance pay, and other programs which tend to soften the transition.

Let us look for a moment at specific examples of the effects of automation on employment.

Two men in a Chicago radio plant assemble 1,000 radios a day using automation; the same job once took 200 workers. A skeleton staff of technicians now runs an entire $40 million oil refinery by remote control from a panel of instruments—an operation which without machines, would require thousands of workers. In some food plants, the entire canning process, including the manufacture of cans and shipping cartons, is completely automatic, untouched by human hands.

These examples of the applications of automation are not isolated ones. They reflect only a small fraction of the uses of automation. The new technology is applicable in at least part of most industries and commercial operations. Automation is making great inroads in the railroad industry, in which the use of robot tracklaying equipment, automatic signaling and communications systems and devices for automatic handling and dispatching of freight cars is widespread.

The current recession has brought the entire problem into clearer focus. Economists say that the slump is almost over—production is spurting ahead. Then why all the unemployment? Why the lag in jobs catching up with revitalized production? Part of the answer, at least, lies in automation. The lifting of the 1957–58 recession had disclosed many vanished jobs, some of which have disappeared forever. Despite a steadily growing labor force, increasing at the rate of nearly a million a year—automation-equipped factories, farms, mines, railroads, and business offices manage to keep the economy humming with fewer and fewer workers. AFL–CIO President George Meany says that industry is now producing more goods with a million fewer workers than in 1942. U.S. production, he says, has recovered about three-fourths of what it lost in the slump, but only one-fourth of the recession-idled workers have gotten their jobs back.

The business magazine U.S. News & World Report made a survey which shows that almost all of the present unemployed would now be at work if employment had gone up as rapidly as production. It reveals that only 1.6 million more people are at work now than at the worst of the recession, in April 1958. That is a rise of only 2.5 percent. Had employment expanded at an equal rate, there would have been an increase of almost 5.6 million jobs instead of 1.6 million. So the study found that the country suffered a net loss of nearly 4 million jobs relative to the sizable potential increase. The study shows that most of the missing jobs were accounted for by gains in productivity—in output per man-hour. Impoved machinery, automation, more skilled workers, all combined to give more production with fewer employees. The rise in productivity was responsible for the loss of 3 million of these 4 million jobs.

At this time, steel production is likely to reach 90 percent, or more of capacity; this will equal production in early 1957; but there is no prospect that employment in the industry will go to what it was 2 years ago. A recent study by the Federal Reserve Board points up that employment gains most certainly have not kept pace with output gains in the current recovery. Newer and more modern facilities for production and utilization of new techniques permitting greater output with less people were cited by the United Steelworkers of America as reasons for the employment decline.

It has become obvious to all—industry, labor, and Government, that there are some basic questions that must be answered if we are to have a healthy, growing economy.

Will automation be good for America, or harmful? Will it create jobs or kill them? Will automation promote monopoly or aid small business? Will it contribute to a rising standard of living and full employment, or have the effect of benefiting only certain segments of the population? Will the transition to the widespread use of automation be accompanied by mass unemployment and social dislocation?

Finding the answers to these and other questions will not be an easy process, and certainly will not be an automatic one. We must find these answers if we are to adjust to the new technology. We must not overlook or minimize the problems which will inevitably arise—problems for individual workers and companies, problems for entire communities and regions, problems for the economy as a whole.

Certainly these new developments in automation should limit and ease the burdens of mankind and benefit all people, but they present, I believe, a serious problem. I feel that a select committee such as is outlined in this bill will be able to find the answers to these vital questions and suggest needed legislation.

ADVERTISING ON FEDERAL HIGHWAYS

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill which will clarify the intent of Congress when it passed the Highway Act with respect to advertising on Federal highways.

I can readily understand the need for regulation of the outdoor advertising business. I do not concur that there is anything in the law that should or would prohibit it.

I am of the further opinion that the general public does not share the violent anti-outdoor advertising feeling shown at hearings by extremist opponents. I militantly oppose the zealous theorists who are trying to restrict them out of business through the gimmick of the one-half of 1 percent bonus deal contained in the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1958. There is serious question as to whether the bonus deal offered in this Highway Act is worth the grief. It promises not much in the way of extra roadbuilding money, only troubles galore for any State which ventures to adopt it. Many States are disillusioned with the bonus deal by its complexity and the fact that the bonus may be eaten up by the cost of compliance.

Outdoor advertising is a legitimate, standardized business. It should be sensibly regulated—not confiscated or abolished. It has recognized its responsibility to the public welfare and is continuously giving of its facilities, time, and talents to promote causes which aid others.

In my own State of New York, over $1 million were spent for electricity to light outdoor signs. Over $3.5 million were paid to taxpaying property owners. for the rental of their land. Twelve and one-quarter million dollars went into payrolls last year. In these days of serious unemployment and underemployment, we cannot afford to abolish the thousands of jobs directly or indirectly involved in this business.

Outdoor advertisers believe in sound planning and zoning consistent with existing land use and with the character of the surroundings and it expects to be treated the same as any other reponsible community business.

Many unsubstantiated charges have been leveled against this business such as traffic safety, despoilers of scenery, eyesores, and so forth, but most of them do not stand up under close scrutiny.

This business does not ask for special treatment. It does not ask to build its displays in nonbusiness areas. They do object, and rightly so, to being discriminated against as the only business to be banned from private lands adjacent to streets and highways.

The standardized outdoor advertising business has voluntarily shown reponsibility and concern for the beauty of our highways, and they are the ones to be penalized in the legislative attack on highway advertising.

The proposed regulations of the Department of Commerce, an agency created to help business, are an all-out attempt to cripple an important medium of advertising. I want to warn that all branches of advertising are in the same boat if the Federal Government decides to move further into the anti-advertising field.

Advertising is a strong, economic factor in the building of our Nation. It is the reason for our lead in mass production and distribution which have brought about our high standard of living. It helps create mass markets for the goods which make our Nation prosperous and furnishes, free of charge, millions of dollars worth of advertising space to worthwhile causes, locally and nationally. It pays real and property taxes, the same as any other business.

I do not concur with the suggestion of information sites as a practical solution for the elimination of advertising for in many States the initial cost of these information sites will be more than the bonus received.

The present ambiguities and unworkable provisions of the present law have brought about a skeptical attitude by many States toward the proposed Federal standards.

For these reasons, I urge the overturning of outdoor advertising prohibitions and regulations by the Department of Commerce as called for in this legislation, and a changed attitude on the part of the Department to foster a sensible, well considered, regulatory rather than confiscatory code of rules for the standardized outdoor advertising industry.

RESIGNATION OF SECRETARY OF STATE JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and to include extraneous material.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, Americans everywhere have joined President Eisenhower in expressing regret on the resignation of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles because of illness.

Men in other parts of the world who recognize Mr. Dulles' dedication to the cause of peace and freedom share this sense of loss. While it is left to the historians of the future to take the measure of his policies, Mr. Dulles has already earned the respect of free people for the personal qualities which characterized his hard-driving and sincere service to the common welfare.

I want to call to the attention of the House the remarks made by the leaders of the House of Commons of the Canadian Parliament on April 15, 1959:

UNITED STATES—RESIGNATION OF JOHN FOSTER DULLES AS SECRETARY OF STATE

Rt. Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): "Mr. Speaker, Members of the House will have heard the announcement this morning by the President of the United States to the effect that due to the state of health of Hon. John Foster Dulles, his resignation has been necessitated as Secretary of State of the United States of America. While I realize that this is not an occasion to give an evaluation of his services to the free world, it will be generally agreed that in the 6 years or more that Mr. Dulles has been in the position of Secretary of State he has given direction to the foreign policy of his country with dedicated purpose, with superb courage and with unchallengeable integrity, and that his views and judgments have left their imprint on the history of these postwar years and the history of all peoples of the world who believe in freedom and its maintenance.

"Canadians will honor him for the understanding and sympathy he has shown at all times in the solution of the problems which arise from time to time between our country and the United States. I believe I express the sentiments of Canadians as a whole when I say that we hope Mr. Dulles will continue to be associated in some less onerous way with the formulation of the foreign policy of the United States, particularly in view of the fact that one and probably two major conferences will take place in the months ahead, at which mankind hopes new milestones will be achieved to the peace and freedom to which Mr. Dulles gave so unstintingly of his outstanding qualities of mind and heart."

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): "Mr. Speaker, in common I think with other Members of the House of Commons I learned with very great regret this morning that reasons of health had compelled the resignation of Mr. Dulles as Secretary of State of the United States. His work in building up the forces of collective resistance in free democracies against aggression has been of immense value. He never spared himself in that work, which he carried on with energy and determination which at times seemed almost superhuman and which undoubtedly was the main reason for the breakdown in his health which has now led to his resignation. If any man was ever a casualty in battle for the things in which he believed, Mr. Dulles is that man.

"When I worked with him, Mr. Speaker, I did not always find myself in complete agreement with all his plans or policies, but I was always in agreement with his objectives. I deeply respected his devotion to his ideals and I admired his indomitable courage, the almost religious zeal which he displayed in pursuit of he purposes in which he believed. In Mr. Dulles' resignation the United States has lost a towering and dedicated public servant, and the cause of freedom has lost a great champion."

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): "We in the C.C.F. regret very much this further indication of the continued deterioration in the health of Mr. John Foster Dulles. Our position in regard to his policies has been made known from time to time. We think it is better at this time to make no detailed or particular comment, but merely say that history itself will judge John Foster Dulles and his policies. We recognize his strong character and the great fight he is waging against this dreadful disease. We regret very much that his health has made it impossible for him to continue the active life that has been his for so many years."

PHOHIBITING NEPOTISM IN ACTIVITIES FINANCED OR AIDED BY PUBLIC FUNDS

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this Nation, it has been traditional that members of a family worked together, helped each other out. Sons joined their fathers, and brother worked with brother and sister to build the family business. Thousands of firms, with names like "Smith Brothers" and "Brown & Sons," are scattered across our country.

A national women's magazine features togetherness for families. During the session of Montana's Legislative Assembly this year, there was special legislation for the small corner grocery stores, the so-called Mom and Pop stores.

Recognizing the public interest in strengthening the American family, Federal and State Governments have extended favored treatment to these small family businesses in many ways.

The tradition that a family takes care of its own also has grown with our corporations. A survey by Fortune magazine of the top executives of 175 of America's largest corporations in 1957 revealed that 55 percent had relatives in management jobs in the same company.

Of 23,000 companies surveyed by the American Institute of Management in 1955, only 28 had stated policies against the employment of relatives. Another study of 8,000 executives disclosed that two out of every five men whose fathers were key executives—and three of every five whose fathers owned large businesses—held jobs in their fathers' companies.

Like their counterparts outside Government, some Members of Congress and of the administration have employed relatives. One reporter theorized recently that about one-fifth of the lawmakers put relatives on their congressional payrolls.

This statement was followed by a mounting wave of criticism of nepotism, defined as favoritism shown relatives. It has been directed principally at Members of Congress, although some casual mention has been made of nepotism in the administration. I personally know some of these relatives who work for Members of Congress as extremely competent and devoted employees. The only justification for criticizing their appointment is the simple fact that they are related to their bosses.

So the published criticism of nepotism is aimed at that involving public funds. Nepotism involving private funds apparently is acceptable.

Montana's legislative assembly moved against nepotism more than 20 years ago. It said that, without regard to the competency of the employees of a public office, no State funds shall be used to employ close relatives of the head of any department or member of any board, bureau, or commission.

The criticism now is that Federal funds are being used to favor relatives. So I have used this Montana statute as a model for a bill. Because the activities of the Federal Government are much wider than those of my State, I have included, not only all three branches of Government, and the independent agencies, but also federally aided business. The latter would include any individual or firm with an interest in a Government contract, or which directly or indirectly receives funds from the United States, or which is directly or indirectly subsidized in its operations by the United States.

As introduced, the bill purposely leaves certain questions unsolved.

It may be that the bill is too restrictive. It may be that we should exclude the armed services—because I, for one, have no desire to deny the President the services of his son as an aide.

It may be that it is in the public interest for a newspaper, or a magazine, which receives a Federal subsidy by using second-class mailing privileges, to have five or six officers and directors who are members of the same family.

It may be that it is in the public interest for the son of a corporate farmer to be in business with his father while at the same time attending college on a federally aided fellowship. It may be that there should still be a "Mom and Pop" store after Pop starts drawing railroad retirement.

It may be that a corporation may have a Government contract, or a rapid tax writeoff and taxpayer-financed nepotism, too.

But this area should be investigated and clearly defined. For it may well be that there are times and places where public funds should go to more than one member of the same family; just as there are times and places where the public funds should not.

LIFE MAGAZINE MISINTERPRETS THE FARM PROBLEM

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, the April 20, 1959, issue of Life magazine contains an editorial which opens with the question:

> If a man came up to you and asked you for a lot of money so he could raise the price of your food and of the shirt on your back, would you hand it over—or sock him?

The editor then answers this heavily loaded question, with an even more heavily loaded answer, as follows:

> The answer is, you are handing it over, billions upon billions, and it is being used to raise the price of your food and clothing. We're talking about the subsidies being paid to farmers for crops that aren't needed, to raise new surpluses to pile on top of staggering existent surpluses.

The ediorial concludes with this bit of advice to the taxpayer:

> So start squawking loud and long enough to put an end, for good and all, to this incredible farm scandal that is getting worse every year.

Before commenting on the analysis of the farm program by the Life editor, I should like to point out that this attack on Federal subsidies was printed in a magazine that receives each month one of the juciest of all Federal subsidies.

Each year American taxpayers dig up nearly $10 million to pay what the Post Office Department loses in second class mailing privileges for Life magazine.

The Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress provides information showing that in 1956, for example, it cost the Post Office $16,979,000 to deliver Life magazine to its readers, but the Post Office collected only $7,485,000 in postage from Life for a net loss to the taxpayers of $9,494,000.

Now it may be that magazines and other publications are of sufficient value to the well-being of the American people that a Federal subsidy of this kind could be justified. I am not dealing with that issue here.

What I would like to suggest is that this editor who is so ready to throw stones at the payments going to farmers should take an appreciative look once in a while at the good things Uncle Sam is doing for him and his fine magazine.

May I suggest the old adage: "People who live in glass houses should not throw stones."

But let me take a look at Life's contention that payments to farmers have raised the cost of food and clothing.

If the editor wishes to establish the point that Secretary Benson has administered his department in a costly manner, there is little room for argument. The Department of Agriculture, under Mr. Benson, has multiplied the costs of the farm programs to an alarming degree. During the first 5 years of his administration of the farm program Commodity Credit Corporation statistics show that Secretary Benson has lost four times as much on the price-support program as was lost in the previous 20 years of price-support operations. The Secretary has, for example, doubled the storage rate per bushel paid to those who store Government commodities.

It is no secret that profits of processors have increased substantially through the combination of lower prices to farmers and higher prices to the consumer.

But to charge, as Life magazine has, that payments to farmers are responsible for high food and clothing prices is grossly unfair and untruthful. Never before in history have the American people been able to feed themselves on so small a share of their total income. The proportion of the consumer's income used for food has steadily declined during the years that the farm program has been in operation. We are spending more for fancy packaging, pre-cooking and other services, but the food itself costs us relatively less than it did before the Federal farm program started.

While the price of everything else has been going up, farm prices have been falling for the past 7 years, falling to a point 20 percent below the 1952 level.

Back in 1947, farmers received 51 cents of the consumer's food dollar. Today, the farmer's share is 39 cents of the food dollar.

The American people consumed 11 percent more food in 1957 than they did in 1952. Yet the farmers who produced that larger supply of food for the tables of America received $600 million less than they received in 1952, the year before Secretary Benson assumed office.

In painful contrast, food processors and other middlemen got $6.1 billion more in 1957 than in 1952 for handling, transporting, and processing the farmer's produce.

When the Life editor charges that the farmer is raising the cost of the shirt on your back, he apparently does not consider that there is only about 25 cents worth of cotton in an ordinary shirt. Even if the farmer gave his cotton away entirely free, we would still pay $2.75 for that $2.98 shirt. In fact, we would in all probability see no reduction at all in the retail price of the shirt. Middlemen would absorb the difference just as they did when farm price cuts were made in recent years.

There is about 2½ cents worth of wheat in the loaf of bread that we buy at the grocery store. Thus, even if the South Dakota wheat farmer gave his wheat to the miller, we could expect at best only a drop of 2 pennies in a loaf of bread. Here, again, one wonders if there would actually be any reduction at all.

It is certainly not the farmer or the farm program that have been responsible for inflation. Farm income dropped by $4 billion during the 5-year period following 1952, while the farmer's costs went up $3.7 billion.

Consider, for example, what has happened in the steel industry. Farmers use more than 7 million tons of steel annually, which is more than the amount needed to produce all of the passenger cars manufactured in the United States for a year. Like other consumers, farm people have been paying heavily for the sharp increases in steel prices of the past few years. During the 1940's, exclusive of the war years, the average steel profit was $6.98 per ton. In 1957, United States Steel showed a net profit of $17.91 per ton.

Following the strike settlement of 1956, steel companies upped their prices $8.50 per ton in spite of the fact that the increase in wages granted in the labor settlement cost them only about $2.50 per ton. Six months later the steel companies added another $5 per ton increase in price and followed this with a third increase of $6 per ton in July 1957. Thus a wage increase costing the companies $2.50 a ton was used as an excuse to add $19.50 a ton to the price of steel.

Recently, a farmer from Britton, S. Dak., sent me a sales slip showing that he had paid $3 for a little steel screw no bigger than the end of his little finger. It was a part needed in the steering mechanism of his tractor. At current farm prices, he pointed out, it would take seven bushels of oats or three bushels of corn to pay for this tiny piece of steel.

I know that farm people would have willingly accepted a cut in farm prices during peacetime if other costs had declined proportionately. But the farmer cannot accept lower prices and higher costs at the same time.

To those who regard the farmer as a greedy, subsidized glutton, I point out that while farmers make up 12 percent of the population, they receive only 4 percent of our national income. Of that meager income, one-third now comes from off-the-farm jobs.

The average per capita income of farm people is approximately half the income of city people.

I submit that those who are really concerned about the economic welfare of the American people should be directing their efforts toward the kind of a strong farm program that would enable farmers to earn their fair share of the national income. The best way to put the 5 million unemployed city dwellers back to work is to restore the purchasing power of the American farmer. Farmers are a $14 billion-a-year customer of industry, to say nothing of the billions of dollars they spend for finished consumer items.

We all know that the present operation of the Department of Agriculture leaves much to be desired, but the problem will not be solved by those who falsely believe that farm price supports have unfairly raised the cost of food and clothing.

I believe that we can establish a farm program that will be fair to farmers, taxpayers, and consumers. The gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] and I are the sponsors of legislation—H.R. 1301 and H.R. 424—which we believe meets this criteria. I urgently hope that in spite of Secretary Benson's opposition this or similar legislation can be enacted into law in the near future.

TAX RELIEF

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced another tax deduction measure which provides for relief to that class of taxpayers who are paying the burden of the freight for the inflated expenses of our Government. I am speaking of people who work, semiskilled or skilled, and who pay most of the taxes.

As presently constituted, section 214 of the Internal Revenue Code for 1954, has a subsection providing for a deduction for the expenses of the care of certain dependents. I think of this as a baby sitter deduction and it is a most deserving deduction. For many who work, a baby sitter is a necessity, and certainly the expenses incurred are incidental to their work.

My bill seeks to do away with certain limitations. The present law only allows a deduction for a taxpayer who is a woman or a widow. My bill would include a taxpayer whose wife is either hospitalized or under a disability. This means that a man who has to leave his home to go to work while his wife is either in the hospital or temporarily or presently disabled from taking over the usual chores can get the deduction, and I think that this is only right.

Our present law limits the deduction to $600. I have in mind the inflated cost of personal service, and I propose to raise that deduction to $1,000.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced other tax legislation, hitting at the injustice of pretending that $600 will pay the expenses of a child for 1 year. It will not do so, and instead of trying to figure some loopholes for bondholders, stockholders and the like, I think we should seek a realistic approach for the man or woman on the street to whom the tax burden is heavy and is a complicated force designed to over-tax the average wage earner, and let those who can afford the tax have extra loopholes.

I certainly hope the Ways and Means Committee will give me an early hearing. This will not cost the Government any appreciable amount and it would help the taxpayer greatly.

EXPLANATION OF THE BILL TO IMPROVE FINANCING OF SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill—H.R. 6594—to improve the financing of small business. It provides that it may be cited by its short title as the "Small Business Capital Bank Act."

OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

The bill has three objectives:

First. The removal from the Federal Government bureaucracy in Washington to the grassroots and into the hands of small businessmen or their representatives the power of decision regarding the financing of any specific business enterprise;

Second. The establishment of a system to be privately owned ultimately for financing small business so that it will not be necessary that we appropriate money from the Treasury of the United States each year for that purpose;

Third. In the establishment of facilities and methods to provide a secondary market nationally that will permit small business interests to secure from private investors the needed funds for financing small business.

OBJECTIVES NOT OPPOSED

There is reason to believe that proposed legislation directed to those three objectives may expect almost unanimous support. Members on both sides of the aisle have contended all along that we should seek these objectives in our proposals for the financing of small business. Elsewhere in the Government strong recommendations have been made that we should provide for private ownership and operation of facilities such as these, and that we should provide to the greatest extent possible for the decisions and the operations in the financing of small business to take place at or near local levels.

This bill accepts the challenges inherent in those ideas and contentions. It is for that reason that it should receive wide support from both sides of the aisle. Of course I have no pride in authorship and fully appreciate that perhaps some would prefer changes in some of the details, but I am convinced that the Members will not differ with me on the objectives of this bill to get small business financing, first, out of Government bureaucracy in Washington; second, under private ownership; third, in such shape that small business can market nationally to private investors the securities for funds needed by small business. Therefore, those who have suggestions for improving the detailed provisions of this bill to obtain those objectives are invited to come forward with their suggestions.

HOW THE BILL ACCOMPLISHES THE OBJECTIVES

The bill would accomplish these objectives by:

First. Amendments to the Small Business Act of 1958 (Public Law 85–536) and the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (Public Law 85–699);

Second. Establishing a small business capital banks system, which would remove from Washington and Federal Government bureaucracy to the grassroots and into the hands of businessmen, the power of decision respecting the financing of any specific business enterprise;

Third. Providing for ultimate private ownership of the small business capital banks system; and Fourth. Establishing means for a secondary market nationally so that for their own security the small business capital banks would be enabled to secure from private investors the funds needed for financing small business.

A NATIONAL SECONDARY MARKET FOR SMALL BUSINESS SECURITIES

In chapter III of the final report of the Select Committee on Small Business, House of Representatives, 85th Congress—House Report No. 2718—commencing with page 31, there was discussed the attention given and action taken on problems relating to equity and long-term financing of small business. In that connection, attention was called to the findings made by the House Small Business Committee in its report on small business financing—House Report No. 1889, 85th Congress—and it was pointed out that the committee's findings and conclusions have enjoyed the concurrence of practically all who have studied the problems of small business financing. The Small Business Committee's recommendations regarding small business financing logically followed its findings and conclusions.

Among those was one that legislation be enacted promptly which would provide leadership in authorizing, promoting, and assisting in the establishment of new facilities to provide long-term loans and equity capital for small business. We recommended that such legislation provide for private ownership for the newly established facilities even though some of the financing by the Federal Government would be required initially. The legislation enacted in Public Law 85–699, approved August 21, 1958, provided for these things. Also, we made the further recommendations:

First. That the establishment of new facilities needed to provide long-term and equity capital for small business include facilities for marketing nationally the securities—as is now done through the Federal National Mortgage Association for Housing and the Federal land bank system for agriculture—to be exchanged for funds needed by small business; and Second. That the legislation should provide to the greatest extent, consistent with good management, for removing from Washington and Federal Government bureaucracy to the grassroots and into the hands of small businessmen the power of decision regarding the financing of any specific business enterprise.

Provisions following those two recommendations were not included in the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, yet the more we study this problem the more we are convinced of the soundness of those two recommendations.

Under existing law, the small-business investment companies will have limited access to sources of capital. They are scattered and without connecting links. Therefore, would-be investors in their securities find it impossible to spread risks of investments to more than the securities of a single small-business investment company. This will hamper the marketing of securities to get the capital needed for small business. The alternative will be to rely more and more upon the Federal Government to finance the operations of small-business financing companies. This should not be.

How can a national secondary market be established for the securities for small business investment companies in order to secure the funds from private investors to finance small business? It is suggested that something be done somewhat along the lines provided for in marketing of securities of building and loan associations in connection with their financing of homebuilding through the Federal National Mortgage Association—FNMA. It is recognized that the small business investment companies, scattered as they will be and relatively unknown to life insurance companies and other important sources of capital, will experience great difficulty in marketing their securities with these sources of capital.

The proposed Small Business Capital Bank Act seeks to provide the facilities that will enable the small business investment companies to market nationally their securities with important sources of capital such as life insurance companies, in much the same manner as national sources of capital purchase securities based on home mortgages. In that connection, note is made also to the facilities established for securing nationally from private investors the capital needed for financing the operations of production credit associations in the field of agriculture. This bill seeks to assist in the financing of small business by securing nationally from private investors capital in much the same manner as has been done through FNMA for homebuilders and the Farm Credit Administration—Federal Land Bank and Production Credit Association System—for farmers.

REMOVING THE POWER OF DECISION IN FINANCING SMALL BUSINESS FROM WASHINGTON TO THE "GRASSROOTS"

A prime objective in providing for the financing of small business in the manner specified in this bill is to remove that financing from Wasington and Federal Government bureaucracy to the "grassroots" and into the hands of small businessmen. Furthermore, in that connection, it would remove the necessity for such financing to be done from the Treasury of the United States and provide that the financing of small business be done instead by private investors and with private capital as is now done in the financing of homebuilders and in the financing of farmers. This aspect of the bill, as one of its prime objectives, should appeal strongly to those who subscribe with emphasis to the proposition that the Government act to turn over to private enterprise activities and responsibilities private enterprise can assume.

Question: How would the bill provide for the changes and objectives which have been mentioned?

Answer: There would be established to operate under Small Business Administration regulations and supervision, 12 small business capital banks. One to be located in each of the existing Federal Reserve districts. It would remain the duty and responsibility if the Small Business Administration in Washington to approve the chartering and operation of small business investment companies in the same manner as the Small Business Investment Act now provides for the Small Business Administration to perform those tasks. However, the actual lending functions in providing small business concerns and small business investment companies with funds through loans would be transferred to the newly established small business capital banks. Therefore, there would be placed in the hands of the officials of those banks and in the hands of the officials of small business investment companies the power, duty, and responsibility for making decisions regarding the financing of any specific business enterprise. That particular function would no longer be in the hands of Federal Government bureaucracy in Washington.

The same safeguards specified in the present Small Business Act and the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 to insure the propriety of small business financial assistance would remain. In other words, financial assistance would be provided to small business enterprises under the same terms and conditions now specified in the Small Business Act of 1958 and the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. The activity would be carried on through different hands on a nonpartisan, informed, and qualified basis.

Question: In addition to transferring the duty, power, and responsibility for making decisions regarding the financing of any specific business enterprise from Federal Government bureaucracy in Washington to the newly established small business capital banks and the small business investment companies, what benefit could come from the establishment of the small business capital banks?

Answer: An added benefit would be the establishment of a financing system somewhat similar to the systems now so successfully operating in the financing of homebuilding under the supervision of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the financing of agriculture through the Federal Lank Bank System and the Production Credit Associations.

Question: How would such system for small business financing operate through the use of the small business capital banks?

Answer: The small business capital banks would be organized with each having authorized capitalization of $50 million. The Small Business Administration would be authorized and directed to subscribe the amount of $1 million paid-in capital and with additional stock to be subscribed for by the small business investment companies licensed by the Small Business Administration to do business with a small business capital bank. Also, there is included a provision that additional shares of stock of the small business capital banks shall be eligible for purchase by national banks and shall be eligible for purchase by other member banks of the Federal Reserve System and nonmember insured banks to the extent permitted under applicable law; except that in no event shall any such bank hold shares in any small business capital bank in an amount aggregating more than 1 percent of the capital and surplus of the bank so holding the stock.

In addition to the provision for paid-in capital and surplus, each of the small business capital banks would have authority and power to borrow funds from the Small Business Administration and from private investors through the offices of the Small Business Administration.

WHERE WILL THE SMALL BUSINESS CAPITAL BANKS BORROW MONEY?

Question: How would the borrowing of funds by the small business capital banks from and through the Small Business Administration be effected?

Answer: Any small business capital bank desiring to secure funds from or through the Small Business Administration would be required to exchange therefor its debenture bonds backed by pledged collateral—which, in turn, would be secured by pledged collateral.

Question: How and from what sources would the Small Business Administration secure the needed funds?

Answer: First, it would draw from a revolving fund; namely, the authorized revolving fund provided for the Small Business Administration in Public Law 85–536 and Public Law 85–699. In addition, this bill authorizes and empowers the Small Business Administration to utilize the debenture bonds it secures from the small business capital banks as collateral to back debenture bonds the Small Business Administration would issue to private investors, such as, for example, insurance companies and commercial banks, in much the same manner as FNMA now issues its debenture bonds for sale to private investors. Through the use of this method for financing small business, it is hoped that we will be able to avoid appropriating money from the U.S. Treasury beyond that presently authorized under present law for the revolving fund of the Small Business Administration.

THE CAPITAL BANK INSURANCE CORPORATION

Question: In order to attract private investors to the debenture bonds issued by FNMA, the Federal Government established a system and method for insuring payment of the underlying mortgages. What, if anything, is provided for in this bill of that character to attract private investors to the debenture bonds which will be issued by the Small Business Administration?

Answer: This bill provides for the creation of a Capital Bank Insurance Corporation. It would be the duty, function, and responsibility of the Capital Bank Insurance Corporation to guarantee the payment of debenture bonds issued by the small business capital banks. This would be done somewhat along the lines of the law which created the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. The salient features of the small business capital bank and insurance system would include the provision—

First. That the Corporation would be under the management of a board of trustees. The trustees would be named from the top officials of the Small Business Administration. They would draw no extra compensation for their services as trustees of the Corporation.

Second. The purpose of the Corporation would be to guarantee the payment of bonds issued by the newly established small business capital banks and thereby enhance the marketability, in secondary market operations, of the debenture bonds issued for sale by the Small Business Administration upon the basis of and secured by the pledged collateral of the insured debenture bonds purchased by the Small Business Administration in exchange for the funds it would have advanced to small business capital banks.

Third. The aggregate principal amount of all obligations of small business capital banks, with respect to which insurance would be granted under this title, would not exceed $600 million at any one time.

Fourth. An insurance reserve would be held by the Corporation. It would consist of a revolving fund built up with funds acquired from the sale of the Corporation's capital stock and through the collection from small business capital banks of insurance premiums. The revolving fund would be permitted to grow until it would equal the total of the aggregate of all prospective debenture bonds expected to be issued by small business capital banks. Also, it would be required that the revolving fund be invested in interest bearing U.S. Government bonds.

In order to get the revolving fund established and operations of the Corporation started, this bill would authorize and direct the Federal Reserve banks to subscribe $100 million—from their section 7 surplus accounts—of the Corporation's capital stock to establish the revolving fund initially. This would have to be retired as rapidly as the revolving fund is built up to the amount of $100 million from other sources.

It is noted that the Banking Act of June 16, 1933, and amendments thereto which created the FDIC, provided the capital necessary to establish the insurance reserve needed by FDIC, including $150 million of capital stock subscribed by the Federal Government, and $139 million subscribed by the Federal Reserve banks, all of which was repaid in full between 1935 and 1950; and under the terms of the law approved August 5, 1947, the FDIC's borrowing power was substantially increased with an authorization to borrow up to $3 billion for insurance purposes from the U.S. Treasury.

It is, therefore, desired that this bill provide for not only the repayment to the Treasury of the original funds secured on loan from the Treasury to establish initially the revolving fund of the Corporation, but also that there be authorization as was in the 1947 FDIC to borrow from the Treasury for insurance purposes an amount up to $1 billion if circumstances should in the future require such borrowing for insurance purposes.

In that connection, the bill would provide that of the authorized capital stock of the corporation each small business capital bank would be required to buy an amount equal to 1 percent of the amount of its obligation insured by the corporation. In addition, the small business capital banks would be required to pay an insurance premium to the corporation in an amount equal to one-half of 1 percent of the amount of the small business capital banks' obligations insured by the corporation.

Fifth. The corporation should be authorized to invest idle funds in the revolving fund making up its insurance reserve. However, its right to invest those funds should be limited to investment in interest-bearing U.S. Government bonds.

Question: How would the small business capital banks make use of the funds they secure from or through the Small Business Administration to finance small business?

Answer: By the terms of this bill there would be transferred to the small business capital banks from the present Small Business Administration, the authority, powers, duties and responsibilities that the SBA now has under the terms of Public Law 85–536, the Small Business Act of 1958, and Public Law 85–699, the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, to make loans to small business concerns, small business investment companies, and State and local development corporations. The small business capital banks would perform those lending functions in the same manner and under the same terms and conditions that those functions are now performed by the present SBA. One feature is added in this respect by the terms of this bill.

THE BILL PROVIDES FOR PRIVATE OWNERSHIP OF SMALL BUSINESS CAPITAL BANKS

The small business investment companies would be expected to purchase capital stock in the small business capital banks from which they secure funds. The provision for that is in keeping with the requirement in the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, which provides that small business concerns in securing funds from small business investment companies are to invest in the capital stock of the small business investment companies in amounts from 2 to 5 percent of the amount of funds loaned to them by the small business investment companies.

It is the purpose of this provision to get the ownership of the small business capital bank system under private ownership, and to remove it entirely from Federal Government or public ownership. This is precisely the method that was used in establishing and providing for the private ownership of the home loan and savings system—for financing home building—and the Federal land bank system—for financing agriculture.

As we all know, the operations of these earlier systems have proven successful beyond what were our expectations. They are 100 percent under private ownership. The Federal Government has recovered all of the money it invested in capitalizing them in order to get them started. All of the capital stock today in those two systems is owned by private investors. It is provided in this bill for private investors representing small business interests to become the private owners of the small business capital bank system.

DINNER AT THE STATLER HOTEL, MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1959

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time for the purpose of reminding my colleagues to check their appointment lists.

You will find on your desks an invitation to a banquet at the Statler Hotel on Monday, the 27th. The invitation is extended by the Coal Operators of the United States, the railroads who are interested in hauling the coal, and the power-producing utilities that are burning coal, for the purpose of trying to do something about the sad plight of the coal and railroad industries of the countries.

This is not going to be just another banquet. The speaker will be President Simpson, of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Mr. G. H. Love, of the Consolidation Coal Co., of Pittsburgh, will be presiding officer. There will be addresses by various groups who are interested.

Let me urge you to attend this banquet at the Statler Hotel and get some information on world problems.

TO AMEND THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1936

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, to provide further requirements to be met by applicants for operating differential subsidies.

Existing law makes it amply clear that Government aid to our merchant marine shall be granted only to those operators who are free of affiliations involving operation of any foreign-flag vessels competing with any American-flag service. These requirements of law were found necessary by the framers of the 1936 act, following intensive study and investigation of existing shipping practices which were contrary to the best interests of our national policy.

The President's budget message called for a reappraisal of the adequacy and need of existing merchant marine policies laid down 23 years ago in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. While such reappraisal is necessary, nevertheless the effort to maintain a strong American merchant marine is a continuing one, and constant attention must be given it.

The bill I have introduced, though touching only one small area of the overall field of national maritime policy, will make an important addition to existing law to assure the continued strength of our vital American-flag merchant marine.

Existing law is not adequate in that it does not require a full airing through public hearings of the question of alien control and affiliation prior to the granting of subsidy. This is a loophole which should be plugged.

Under the law as it stands, no examination of foreign-flag connections is undertaken until after the subsidy is granted, and then there is no provision for public hearing. I believe that it would be fairer to the applicant and to existing subsidized operators to clear this matter in advance of final action on the subsidy to minimize to a degree the voluminous and necessarily expensive proceedings required by law in connection with the subsidy grant.

CONTROL OF NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the continuation of nuclear testing has implications for the health of our children which cannot longer be disregarded.

The potential injurious effect of strontium 90 in the bones of American children doubled between 1955 and 1957.

Although much responsible authority considers the present level of strontium 90 in the atmosphere to be far below the permissible maximum, nevertheless, the mere fact that there has been this 100-percent increase is certainly a dangerous signal which calls for serious examination of the present situation.

The current Geneva negotiations provide another opportunity to explore the possibility of agreement with the Russians on some form of control of this noxious experimentation. Even though the current attitude of the Russians seems inflexible, nevertheless, I strongly urge our delegation at Geneva to explore minutely every possible avenue of agreement in the hope that some meeting of the minds may be discovered.

The dismal alternative of continuing the tests and filling the atmosphere with death-dealing fallout demands that the utmost effort be made consistent with our national interest to obtain agreement in this vital area.

For the details of the report to which I have referred, I include herewith an article from the New York Times of April 22, 1959, as follows:

RISE IN STRONTIUM IS FOUND IN YOUNG—REPORT SHOWS A DOUBLING OVER 2-YEAR PERIOD—LEVEL STILL HELD SAFE

A new report on strontium 90 shows that the concentration of the radioactive substance in the bones of American children doubled between 1955 and 1957.

The increase was greater than that recorded by earlier studies. The levels involved remain far below the estimated maximum permissible concentration of strontium 90 in human bones.

There has been considerable debate among scientists, however, on whether the present permissible concentration is a valid guide to safety for the general population.

Strontium 90 is considered one of the more hazardous components of fallout from atomic explosions.

ENTERS HUMAN BONES

It is a radioactive form of the natural element strontium and, being chemically similar to calcium, tends to be taken up by human bone once the substance gets into the food or water supply.

In high enough concentrations, strontium 90 is considered capable of producing bone cancer or leukemia.

The new report is by Drs. J. Lawrence Kulp, Arthur R. Schulbert, and Elizabeth J. Hodges of Columbia University's Lamont Geological Observatory.

It was written for publication in Science, weekly scientific journal of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, but has not yet appeared there.

PUBLISHED IN THE NATION

An article by Walter Schneir in the current issue of the Nation, however, has made public some of the findings and conclusions of the report. The issue went on general sale Monday.

A draft text of the report has also been obtained by the New York Times. The data indicate an average bone concentration of somewhat more than 1.33 strontium units per gram of calcium in the latest sampling of bones of North American children up to the age of 4.

Most of the samples were obtained from children who died before the end of 1957.

Comparable figures were 0.67 for samples obtained in 1956 and 0.56 for the previous year.

EARLIER YEAR LOWER

Figures for the next previous year, published by the Lamont group in February 1957, showed an average bone concentration for the same age group of 0.37 strontium units.

One of the others of the three reports said yesterday, however, that further analysis of the technique of evaluation showed that this figure should have been slightly higher than it was.

A strontium unit is equal to one micromicrocurie of the radioactive substance. This is a millionth of a millionth of a curie, a standard unit of radiation.

The current maximum permissible bone concentration of strontium 90 for the population at large is 100 strontium units. That is, 100 micromicrocuries per gram of calcium.

CONCENTRATED IN CHILDREN

Because children take up more calcium to supply growing bones, strontium 90 levels are at their highest in the young.

The report estimates that in January 1958, the average world strontium 90 burden in adult skeletons was 0.19 micromicrocuries of strontium per gram of calcium.

New York City sampling, of adult whole skeletons, has shown a steady annual rise of about 50 percent during four consecutive yearly periods, according to the data.

The latest of these is labeled July 1956–June 1957. However, one of the authors said yesterday that there were considerable delays in getting samples. The bones tested, therefore, probably represented an earlier period.

The scientists predicted that in 1966—barring further atom tests, the world's average young child would have a bone concentration of 4 micromicrocuries of strontium +90 per gram of calcium.

Ten percent may run as high as 8 units and 1 percent as high as 20. The prediction holds that none will exceed 80.

The article in the Nation charges the Atomic Energy Commission with "sitting on" the report, which has been circulating among certain scientists for some time.

The Commission is criticized for not moving to make the report public quickly and in some form more generally distributed than an article in Science.

A spokesman for the Commission's New York operations office said the Commission was not officially involved with the report, though some of its scientists had been sent copies for comment before publication.

The Commission has not influenced publication of the report and the decision to publish in Science was made independently by Dr. Kulp, who is now in England, the spokesman said.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPOINTMENTS

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the nomination of young men to the military service academies is, I feel, not only a privilege, but also a serious responsibility. I am sure that all Members of the Congress are very careful in their selections and base their decisions entirely upon merit. I am also sure, Mr. Speaker, that the methods used by Members of Congress in screening applicants for these nominations have been decided upon only after the most thorough consideration of all the factors present in each congressional district.

In the Third District of Ohio, Mr. Speaker, I use four main factors in determining my final selections. Each young man is, first, required to participate in a competitive examination conducted by the Civil Service Commission; second, is required to send me a complete transcript of his high school grades; third, is required to have submitted in his behalf a number of recommendations from persons in the community who have had an opportunity to evaluate his personal qualifications over a long period of time and from various points of view; and fourth, he must pass a preliminary physical examination conducted at a military hospital.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from Maj. Gen. R. V. Lee, Adjutant General of the Army, indicating a change in the procedures for examining the nominees. This, I feel, is a move in the wrong direction and I have written the Adjutant General protesting the discontinuance of the preliminary physical examination. In the hope that my protest may be of interest and help to other Members who use this means of determining an applicant's physical fitness, under unanimous consent I ask that my letter to Maj. Gen. R. V. Lee be made a part of these remarks.

The letter follows:

APRIL 22, 1959.

Maj. Gen. R. V. LEE,
The Adjutant General,
Department of the Army,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL LEE: I have your letter of April 15 before me and have given a great deal of thought to your proposed new system for determining the medical qualifications of applicants for admission to the Military Academy.

While I do not expect to be nominating anyone for the 1960 class, nevertheless, I want to express my opinion on this subject in the hope it will induce you to postpone putting the plan in operation until you have reconsidered it carefully. The preliminary physicals have had a great influence on my selection of candidates and, without them, I would be at a loss to choose my nominees. I presume other Members of Congress will be in the same predicament if they are as careful as I am in screening my applicants. I certainly do not think you would be simplifying or improving the present nominating system any by doing away with the preliminary physicals. Rather, I think you would be doing just the opposite if you want to expedite the processing of the hundreds of nominees recommended to you each year.

Looking at this from the standpoint of its advantage to the boy himself. I want to stress the fact that the boy who comes from a low-income family would be hard pressed to pay for a thorough examination by a private doctor who may charge as much as $50, or more. While I realize that the preliminary physicals are only advisory in nature. I believe that the military physicians are more familiar with the requirements for admission to the Academy than are private doctors. Therefore, their reports are of more value in determining the applicant's chances of passing the final examination.

We have the Wright-Patterson Air Force Base Hospital in my district which is, of course, a distinct advantage to the applicants in that vicinity. If the Army Department is sincere in its plea for candidates of the highest caliber in every respect, then it should be willing to offer its examining facilities to the Members of Congress who assume the responsibility given them by law to screen the applicants for further testing by the Academy Board.

To my way of thinking, it is most unfair to take these testing facilities away from the Members of Congress and the boys themselves. We all have one aim and purpose, which is to provide the Army with the best officer potential. I, for one, consider this a very important duty and a privilege not to be taken lightly. I try to send you the very finest young men graduating from our district high schools and I have never yet recommended anyone who I thought would fail either the mental or medical examination. I use every means at my disposal to evaluate each applicant's fitness for the career he seeks and the preliminary physical is of equal importance with the Civil Service test, the young man's high school record, and the personal recommendations which reveal so much about the qualities he has which are necessary to an officer of the armed services.

It just does not seem reasonable to me to permit a Member of Congress to nominate a boy who has had hopes for a period of 6 months or more of getting an appointment and then later, ask that same member to withdraw the name and recommend another nominee. Such a procedure would be unfair to the boys concerned and complicate the clerical work both of the Academy section and the congressional office. My applicants are all examined early in the summer so that if any minor defect shows up in the examination, it can be corrected before the end of the year. If it is a serious one that would definitely bar his admission to the Academy, he is advised and he goes ahead and makes other plans for the fall.

Unless you can give me more convincing arguments for discontinuing the preliminary physicals than mentioned in your letter, I must strenuously oppose your action. I hope my colleagues here in the Congress will concur with my opinions because they will all be as handicapped as I would be if your new system is allowed to go into effect. I respectfully request that you reconsider your proposal very carefully.

With kindest regards.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL F. SCHENCK,
Representatives to Congress,
Third District, Ohio.

WISCONSIN'S LEGISLATURE UNANIMOUSLY SUPPORTS THE ICE AGE NATIONAL PARK FOR WISCONSIN

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, bills now before the Congress would create an Ice Age National Park in Wisconsin. The National Park Service is presently studying the feasibility of the proposal and is expected to make its report within the next few months.

Meanwhile the Wisconsin Legislature has unanimously approved a joint resolution expressing its approval in principle of the Ice Age National Park. The resolution, which was adopted on April 9, 1959, follows:

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 13

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to take steps to acquire, establish and develop a Kettle Moraine National Park in Wisconsin to properly commemorate the Glacial Age

Whereas one of the most important chapters in the geographical and geological history of our country, much more important than the features which most of our present national parks are dedicated to preserve or commemorate, is the Glacial Age—a period when glaciers repeatedly invaded the north central and northeastern parts of the United States and gorgeously carved and remodeled the entire surface of this area into a huge panorama of one of nature's rarest wonderworks; and

Whereas because the Kettle Moraine State Park in Wisconsin is the only memorial established in recognition of these historical facts of national moment that indelibly molded the geographical character of this great expanse; because categorically the Kettle Moraine area is by far the most attractive and representative in which to establish a national park to commemorate the Glacial Age and its impact on this territory and the lives and habits of its people; because at present costs and rate of progress it will take the State of Wisconsin another 50 years to complete acquisition and development of the Kettle Moraine State Park as proposed in a 1936 State survey; because this land must be purchased and developed soon—before the inevitable population explosion, which is destined to follow the opening of the St. Lawrence Waterways, strikes Wisconsin and sends costs skyrocketing to prohibitive heights; because it is important that not only Wisconsin but this entire north central and northeastern area be provided with a Kettle Moraine National Park to give outdoor recreational opportunities for its rapidly increasing population; the State of Wisconsin seeks the aid of the Federal Government in developing a Kettle Moraine National Park and promises active cooperation toward bringing to reality in the Kettle Moraine area a national park concept to properly commemorate the Glacial Age; and

Whereas the Republican Party in Wisconsin expressed the desire of thousands of people in Wisconsin and in this entire glacial area, when at its platform convention in 1958, it adopted the following resolution:

"We recognize the desirability of preserving the Kettle Moraine area of Wisconsin as a national park and pledge immediate cooperation with the Federal authorities in preserving the maximum area of this desirable region"; and

Whereas the Democratic Party State platform adopted in 1958 said in part "The Democratic Party favors: * * *

"4. Adoption of the basic plan of the proposed Moraine National Park for Wisconsin." Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializes the Congress of the United States to take necessary steps to acquire, establish and develop a Kettle Moraine National Park in Wisconsin to properly commemorate the Glacial Age, and pledges cooperation toward bringing to reality, in the Kettle Moraine area in Wisconsin, such national park concept; and, be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, to each House of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Governor Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin has also pledged the full cooperation of the State of Wisconsin to the creation of the Ice Age National Park. There follows an account of the Governor's statement from the April 21 issue of the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times:

GOVERNOR BACKS ICE AGE PARK

Governor Nelson today in a statement approved the action of the legislature in unanimously adopting a joint resolution memorializing Congress to acquire establish and develop an Ice Age National Park in Wisconsin.

Nelson pointed out that Representative HENRY S. REUSS, Democrat of Milwaukee, is sponsor of an original measure providing for such a national park and he is being joined by Senators WILEY and PROXMIRE in the effort.

"It is my opinion that the Ice Age National Park in Wisconsin will be of substantial benefit to the State and its people," Nelson said. He continued.

"Based on the experience of other States having national parks, it will be of direct and immediate monetary benefit in terms of increased tourist business.

"It will be up to the National Park Service to give us its preliminary concept of the Ice Age National Park.

"The State of Wisconsin will cooperate in every possible way, both in the preliminary phases and in subsequent steps necessary to make the Ice Age National Park a reality."

During the consideration by the Wisconsin Legislature of the joint resolution approving the Ice Age National Park, I presented a statement to the Wisconsin Legislature setting for the present status of the proposed park, its concept, methods of land acquisition, and its economic impact. The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE HENRY S. REUSS (MILWAUKEE), BEFORE THE CONSERVATION COMMITTEE OF THE WISCONSIN ASSEMBLY, STATE CAPITOL, MADISON, MARCH 11, 1959

I deeply appreciate the opportunity to make a statement in favor of the resolution, now before the Wisconsin Legislature, expressing support in principle for the proposed Ice Age National Park. As the author of the bill in Congress, H.R. 915, to authorize the establishment of an Ice Age National Park (a descriptive title being more comprehensive than that used earlier of the Moraine National Park, I believe that such a declaration of support by the Wisconsin Legislature would be of tremendous help in securing establishment of the park. Similar bills have been introduced in the U.S. Senate by Senator WILEY, (S. 894), by Senator PROXMIRE (85th Cong., S. 4159), and in the House by Representative JOHNSON (H.R. 3020).

Here is the relevant information concerning the proposed Ice Age National Park:

1. WHAT IS THE PRESENT STATUS OF THE PARK?

The National Park Service conducted a preliminary reconnaissance of the proposed Ice Age National Park in September 1958. The results of that study were presented to the Advisory Board on National Parks. On October 22, 1958, the Advisory Board passed a resolution noting the importance of continental glaciation during the great Ice Age, and directed the National Park Service to locate appropriate examples of such glaciation for inclusion in the National Park System. Now and in the months to come, the National Park Service is making additional detailed studies. It is hoped that the Park Service can make a favorable recommendation by later this year. If so, Congress would be able to act upon the bills to establish the Ice Age National Park a year from now, in 1960. Needless to say, support in principle from the Wisconsin Legislature would be an important factor in determining congressional action.

2. WHAT IS THE CONCEPT OF THE ICE AGE NATIONAL PARK?

The concept of the park, as originally conceived by Raymond T. Zillmer, the noted Milwaukee conservationist, and as refined by the reconnaissance trip, proposes that areas in 34 Wisconsin Counties (Kewaunee, Manitowoc, Calumet, Fond du Lac, Sheboygan, Washington, Waukesha, Jefferson, Walworth, Rock, Green, Dane, Sauk, Columbia, Adams, Marquette, Waushara, Portage, Waupaca, Marathon, Shawano, Langlade, Lincoln, Oneida, Price, Taylor, Rusk, Chippewa, Washburn, Sawyer, Barron, Polk, Dunn, and St. Croix) be considered for inclusion in the park. H.R. 915 provides for the preservation of "outstanding features of continental glaciation, including moraines, eskers, kames, kettle-holes, drumlins, swamps, lakes, and other reminders of the great Ice Age."

The concept of the park envisages a narrow strip, averaging one-quarter mile in width, extending for 500 miles along the terminal line of the Wisconsin glacial moraine. The line would extend from Glenbeulah in Sheboygan County through Fond du Lac, Washington and Waukesha Counties to Whitewater Lake in Walworth County; thence westward through Walworth and Rock Counties, north of County Highway A to the Rock River; thence northwest to Evansville north of State Highway 14; thence northeast of the C. & N.W. Railroad tracks to Brooklyn; thence northwest through Verona and Cross Plains to the Dane-Columbia County line; thence along the east bank of the Wisconsin River to Merrimac; thence northwest to Devils Lake State Park; thence north, between State Highway 12 and Sauk County Trunk Highway A, to the Wisconsin River at the confluence of Dell Creek; thence north through Columbia and Adams Counties to the conjunction of Adams, Waushara, and Marquette Counties; thence northward in Waushara County west of Coloma, through Hancock and east of Plainfield; through the Portage County line west of Almond; thence north passing west of Custer and Polonia, crossing the Plover River at the Portage-Marathon County line; thence west of the Plover River to the Langlade County line; thence northeast to Highway 64; thence northwest passing south of Kempster to 1 mile south of Parrish; thence southwest passing near Gleason to the Wisconsin River; thence west to Rib Lake; thence southwestward through Chequamegon National Forest, west of Lublin; and westward to the Chippewa River south of Cornell; then a gap to the conjunction of Chippewa County Highways E and Z; thence northwestward to a point just north of Haugen in Barron County on Highway 53; thence southwestward, south of Cumberland, Turtle Lake, Clayton, Amery, north of Deer Park, through Star Prairie; thence west to the St. Croix River.

Along the 500-mile trail would be 11 (possibly more) main units, under varying management, but pulled together by the National Park Service in order to tell the total story of the Ice Age in North America. Starting from the eastern end of the 500-mile-long line, the 11 units, and their ownership, follow:

1. Sheboygan Marsh County Park: A marsh created by the glacial moraine. This marsh, which is open to hunting and fishing, adjoins the Kettle Moraine State Forest in northwestern Sheboygan County.

2. Kettle Moraine State Forest: Stretching for 120 miles from Glenbeulah in Sheboygan County to Whitewater Lake in Walworth County, an interlobate glacial moraine formed by the interaction of the Green Bay and Michigan lobes, illustrating kettles, kames, and eskers.

3. Janesville Gateway: The terminal moraine, and some adjacent territory, in the triangle just north of Janesville bounded by Highway 14, Highway 184, and the Rock River. This area, together with areas 4, 6, 7, and 8, are suggested as national park proper. Since these areas are strung out over the 120-mile central portion of the 500-mile-long strip, within 20 or 30 miles of each other, they could readily be directly administered by the National Park Service.

4. Western Dane County: An area in the general area of Verona, Cross Plains, and Marxville, illustrating the intermixture of glacial moraines and unglaciated bedrock. Several high points give a vista of the entire area.

5. Devil's Lake State Park (Sauk County): Shows the formation of Devil's Lake, and the change in course of the Wisconsin River, together with the effect of the Baraboo Hills in stopping the expansion of the glacier into the unglaciated area. This would continue as a State park.

6. John Muir birthplace (southern Marquette County): Shows a glacial lake back of the moraine, particularly its botany. This is now a Marquette County park, but funds for further development are needed. Because it contains the boyhood home of the great naturalist, John Muir, it is suggested as a national historic monument or park.

7. Old Lake Wisconsin Shore (Adams County): An area east of Friendship in Adams County. It shows the sandy bottom of extinct glacial Lake Wisconsin, the moraines which formed its shores, and various eroded bluffs which were islands in the lake.

8. Plover River unit (at the junction of Portage and Marathon Counties): Shows how the Plover River forced its way through the moraine.

9. Chequamegon National Forest (Taylor County): Shows the effect of a glacial moraine in diking myriads of lakes. Under National Forest Service auspices, camping facilities and a trail along portions of the moraine could be constructed.

10. Blue Hills unit (in northeast Barron County, northwest Rusk County, and southwest Sawyer County): Show how the glacial moraine worked its way through and around the preexisting monadnocks. Adequate land for such a unit is presently contained in county forests in the three counties. The units could be adapted either as coordinated county forests; as a State forest; as a national forest; or as a national park or national park recreational area.

11. Interstate Park at St. Croix Falls: Illustrates water erosion in a glaciated area, at the dells of the St. Croix River. This could be continued as a Wisconsin-Minnesota State park.

It will be noted that these 11 units include, in addition to national park proper, a county park (1), a State forest (2), 2 State parks (5, 11), a national forest (9), and a possible national park recreational area (10).

Literature describing the park, and the explanations of naturalists at the various points of attraction, could be so coordinated as to present a unified whole. Similarly, road markings could be so arranged that those wishing to see the entire glacial story could make a 500-mile trip of it and visit each of the units. Suitable walking, bicycling, and riding trails could be developed along the entire area. Camping and picknicking spots could likewise be strategically placed.

H.R. 915 provides for the establishment of the Ice Age National Park at such time as enough of it is acquired in order to permit effective administration. If the Ice Age National Park becomes a reality, it is anticipated that full acquisition of all the land needed will consume at least a number of years.

3. HOW WILL LAND FOR THE ICE AGE NATIONAL PARK BE ACQUIRED?

To make it a reality will require the full cooperation of the Federal Government, the State of Wisconsin, and county and local governments. H.R. 915 provides that "lands owned by the State and local governments may be included only with the concurrence of such governments." Aside from the Kettle Moraine State Forest, the strip from Whitewater Lake to the St. Croix River, roughly 400 miles averaging one-quarter mile in width, would make a total of 100 square miles, or 64,000 acres. At an average cost of $30 an acre, this would come to $1,920,000. To be subtracted from this figure would be lands that do not have to be purchased because they are contained in a State park, county park, county forest, or national forest. It is envisaged that the great bulk of this land would be purchased and donated to the national park by private contribution, leaving little or no land acquisition to the Federal Government in the first instance. The main function of the Ice Age National Park would be to pull together the national park proper, and such constituent units as county parks, State forests, State parks, national forest, and national recreational areas, into a unified whole.

4. WHAT WOULD BE THE ECONOMIC IMPACT OF AN ICE AGE NATIONAL PARK FOR WISCONSIN?

The main purpose of the Ice Age National Park would be to provide for all the people healthful and pleasant recreation areas. But in sheer dollar terms, there is no doubt the Park could be a tremendous money-earner, both for State and local governments in Wisconsin, and for its citizens. A survey in 1949, "The Wisconsin Tourist," by the University of Wisconsin, showed that even 10 years ago, out-of-State tourists spent more than $76 million a year in Wisconsin—for food, lodging, transportation, fishing, clothing, amusements, etc. Surely, that total is closer to $100 million today. And the amount spent by residents of Wisconsin itself would increase the total greatly.

Experience in States having national parks shows that they enormously increase the number of tourists, with attendant increase in expenditures. Last year 59 million Americans visited their national parks. When you consider that the University of Wisconsin's estimate of the nonresident tourists in Wisconsin in 1949 was only 1,125,000, it can readily be seen that the existence of a national park in Wisconsin could well double or triple our present tourist influx.
